"When I paint my fingernails, one side always looks better than the other. With her, both sides look perfect."

He smiled again. "This, my dear, is why more women should be in my field."

Amanda doubted any sane woman would ever do this job—at least not one who ever wanted to get married. "Maybe she has a friend who painted her fingernails?"

"Do women really groom one another? I assumed Behind the Green Door was taking cinematic liberties.”

Amanda ignored the observation. She carefully put Lucy’s hand back down on the table. It was so easy to focus on the parts rather than the whole. She’d let herself forget that Lucy Bennett was an actual human being.

This was to be blamed in part because Amanda had not yet looked at the girl’s face. Amanda forced herself to do so now. She felt her early steeliness, but there was a tandem emotion of what could only be called curiosity. With the blood washed from Lucy’s face, she looked different. As in Roz’s photo, the skin still hung loosely to the side, but something beyond the obvious was not right.

“Could you ...” Amanda didn’t want to sound morbid, but she pushed through it. “Can I see her teeth?”

“Most of them were broken in the fall. What are you getting at?”

“The skin on her face. Is it possible to move it back to—”

“Oh, of course.” Pete went to the head of the table. He gripped the loose flesh of the cheek and forehead and pulled it back over her skull. Lucy had bitten her lip in the fall. Pete returned it to the proper position. He used his fingers to tuck the skin into place around the eyes and nose, like a baker kneading dough. “What do you think?”

Amanda realized it was exactly as she had expected. This woman was not Lucy Bennett. The scars on her wrist weren’t the only indication. The open sores on her feet had a familiar pattern, like a constellation of stars. Barring that, there was the face, which clearly belonged to Jane Delray. “I think we need to get Evelyn back in here.”

“How intriguing.”

Amanda left the room through the swinging doors. The lab was empty, so she pushed open the other set of doors leading into the hallway. Evelyn was several yards ahead, close to the entrance. She was talking with a man wearing a navy blue suit. He was tall, over six feet. His sandy brown hair touched his collar. The tailoring of his clothes was obviously professional. The jacket curved into his back. The flared pants hovered over his white loafers. He was finishing a cigarette when Amanda joined them. Evelyn shot her a look, her eyes practically bulging from their sockets.

She was talking to Mr. Blue Suit.

“Mr. Bennett.” Evelyn’s voice was pitched higher than usual, though she was doing a good job of hiding her excitement. “This is my partner, Miss Wagner.”

He barely glanced at her, keeping his eyes on his white loafers as he stamped out the cigarette. “As I said, I just want to see my sister and leave.”

“We had a few more questions,” she began, but Bennett cut her off.

“Is there a man I can talk to? Someone in charge?”

Amanda thought of Pete. “The coroner is in the back.”

Bennett’s lips twisted in distaste, whether at the thought of the coroner or what he saw in Amanda, she wasn’t sure. And it really didn’t matter. The only thing she could focus on was how arrogant and unlikable he was.

Amanda said, “Dr. Hanson is preparing the body. It’ll only be a few more minutes.”

Evelyn picked up the lie. “You won’t want to see her how she is now, Mr. Bennett.”

“I don’t want to see her period,” he snapped back. “As I told you, Mrs.

Mitchell, my sister was a drug addict and a whore. What I'm doing here is a mere formality so that my mother can have some peace at the end of her life."

"His mother has cancer," Evelyn explained.

Amanda let a few seconds pass out of respect for the man's mother, but she couldn't stop herself from asking, "Mr. Bennett, can you tell us when was the last time you saw your sister?"

He glanced away. "Five, maybe six years?" He looked down at his watch. It was a furtive movement, as obvious as Evelyn tugging the back of her hair. "I really do not appreciate your wasting my time. Shall I go back to the coroner?"

"Just another minute." Amanda had never been good at spotting a liar, but Bennett was as easy to read as an open book. "Are you sure that's the last contact you had with your sister?"

Bennett took a pack of Parliaments from his breast pocket and shook out a cigarette. A large gold college ring was on his middle finger. UGA Law School. Class of '74. The Georgia Bulldog was etched into the red stone.

Amanda asked, "Mr. Bennett, are you sure about the timing? It seems like you've had contact with Lucy more recently."

He showed a flash of guilt as he jammed the cigarette between his lips. "I mailed her a letter to the Union Mission. It was perfunctory, I assure you."

"On Ponce de Leon?" Amanda asked. The Ponce Union Mission was the only homeless facility that allowed women.

Bennett said, "I tried to find Lucy when our father passed away. My mother had it in mind that she'd joined the hippie movement—you know, just dropped out for a while. She thought Lucy would want to come home, go to college, live a normal life. She could never accept that Lucy chose to be a whore."

Evelyn asked, "When did your father pass?"

Bennett flicked his gold lighter, taking his time to light the cigarette. He didn't speak again until he'd blown out a stream of smoke. "It was a few weeks after I graduated from law school."

"Last year?"

"Yes. July or August. I can't recall." He inhaled deeply on the cigarette. "Lucy was never really a good girl. I suppose she fooled us all, right up until she ran off with some greaser to Atlanta. I'm sure you've heard this story more than a dozen times." He exhaled, smoke curling from his nostrils. "She was always too willful. Stubborn."

Amanda asked, "How did you know to mail the letter to the Union Mission?"

Bennett seemed irritated that she wouldn't let him change the subject. "I made some calls to some people. They said that Lucy probably would've ended up there."

Amanda wondered who these people were. She took a chance. "Are you a litigator, Mr. Bennett?"

"No, I do tax abatement. I'm a first-year associate at Treadwell-Price downtown. Why do you ask?"

So, Evelyn was right. He'd obviously gotten his boss to make a phone call. "Did you hear back from your sister?"

"No, but the man working there assured me that he gave the letter to Lucy. For whatever that's worth."

"Do you remember the man's name?"

"Trask? Trent?" Bennett blew out a plume of smoke. "I don't know. He was very unprofessional. Dirty clothes. Hair unkempt. Frankly, there was an odor about him. I imagine he's a marijuana smoker."

"You met him in person?"

"You can't trust these people." He sucked on the cigarette. "I thought I might find Lucy there. What I found was a bunch of disgusting whores and drunkards. Just the sort of place I knew Lucy would end up."

"Did you see her?"

"Of course not. I doubt I would even recognize her."

Amanda nodded, though this seemed like an odd statement coming from a man who was about to identify his dead sister's body.

Evelyn asked, "Do you know a young woman named Kitty Treadwell?"

He narrowed his eyes. Smoke drifted from the tip of his cigarette. "What do you know about Kitty?" He didn't let them answer. "You two ladies should mind where you stick your noses. They're liable to get cut off."

The front doors slammed open. Rick Landry and Butch Bonnie walked into the hallway. Both men scowled when they saw Amanda and Evelyn.

"Finally," Bennett mumbled.

Landry was visibly furious. He stomped forward, demanding, "What the hell are you two slits doing here?"

Amanda was standing beside Evelyn. It didn't take much to get in front of her, blocking Landry in the process. "We're investigating our case."

Landry didn't bother responding to her statement. He turned, his shoulder bumping into Amanda's so hard that she had to step back. "Hank Bennett?"

Bennett nodded. "Are you in charge?"

"Yes," Landry said. "We are." He crowded out Amanda, forcing her to step back again as he inserted himself between her and Bennett. "I'm sorry about your loss, sir."

Bennett waved his hand, as if it was nothing. "I lost my sister a long time ago." Again, he checked his watch. "Can we get this over with? I'm late for supper."

Landry walked him down the hallway. Butch took up the rear. He glanced back at Amanda and Evelyn. He gave Amanda an unwelcome wink. She waited until they disappeared behind the door.

Evelyn hissed out air between her teeth. She put her hand to her chest. She was shaking.

"Come on." Amanda grabbed Evelyn's hand. The other woman was resistant. Amanda had to pull her down the hallway. She pushed ajar the door to the lab just as the three men were walking into the morgue.

Amanda waited until they were inside before opening the door. She kept her knees bent, as if she was sneaking around. The curtains on the large picture window were still drawn.

Evelyn whispered, "Amanda—"

"Shh," Amanda shot back. Carefully, she parted the drapes a few inches. Evelyn joined her as they peered through the window.

Pete Hanson stood with his back to the far wall. His arms were crossed. He'd struck Amanda as a very easygoing fellow, but there was something in his posture that indicated he was very unhappy.

Landry and Butch had their backs to the window. Hank Bennett stood opposite, the dead girl between them. He was looking down at the victim's face.

Apparently, Evelyn was, too. She whispered, "That's Jane Delray," at the same moment Hank Bennett said, "Yes, that's my sister."

April 15, 1975

LUCY BENNETT

There was another girl in the next room. The old one was gone. She hadn't been bad, but this one was awful. Constantly crying. Sobbing. Begging. Pleading.

She sure as hell wasn't moving. Lucy could guarantee that. None of them moved. The pain was too excruciating. Too unspeakable. It took your breath away. It blacked you out.

At first, it was impossible not to try. Claustrophobia took over. The unreasonable fear of suffocation. It started in the legs like the cramps from withdrawal. Your toes curled. Your muscles ached to contract. It worked its way through your body like a violent storm.

Last month, a tornado had hit the Governor's Mansion. It started in Perry Homes, but no one cared about that. The Governor's Mansion was different. It was a symbol, meant to show businessmen and visiting dignitaries that Georgia was the heart of the New South.

The tornado had other ideas.

The roof had been torn off. The grounds damaged. Governor Busbee said that he was saddened by the destruction. Lucy had heard him say so on the news. It was a special bulletin cut between the replay of the top-forty countdown. Linda Ronstadt's "When Will I Be Loved," then the governor saying they were going to rebuild. A phoenix rising from the ashes. Hopeful. Certain.

Back when it got really cold, the man had started to let Lucy listen to the transistor radio. He kept it turned down low so the other girls couldn't hear. Or maybe he kept it low special for Lucy. She would listen to the news, tales of the whole wide world spinning by. She would close her eyes and feel the ground moving underneath her.

Lucy didn't like to think too much about it, but she could tell she was his favorite. It reminded her of the games she and Jill Henderson used to play in elementary school. Jill was good with her hands. She'd take a sheet of notebook paper and fold it into triangles. What was it called?

Lucy tried to think. It didn't help that the other girl was sobbing so hard. She wasn't loud, but she was consistent, like a kitten mewing.

Cootie Catchers. That was it.

Jill would slide her fingertips into the folded sections. There were words written on the inside. You asked who liked you. Who was going to marry you. Were you going to be happy? Were you going to have one kid or two?

Yes. No. Maybe. Keith. John. Bobby.

It wasn't just the radio that made Lucy feel special. The man spent more time with her. He was gentler with her than he was before—than he was with the other girls, because Lucy could hear it.

How many other girls had there been? Two, three? All weak. All familiar.

The new girl in the other room should stop fighting back. She should just give in and he would make it all better. Otherwise, she would end up like the girl before. And the one before that. Nothing would get better. Nothing would change.

Things had changed for Lucy. Instead of the pieces of Vienna sausage and stale bread he'd shoved between her teeth in the early days, he was letting her feed herself. She sat on the bed and ate McDonald's hamburgers and french fries. He would sit in the chair, knife in his lap, watching her chew.

Was it Lucy's imagination, or was her body healing itself? She was sleeping more deeply now. Those first weeks—months?—she'd had nothing to do but sleep, but back then, every time she found herself nodding off, she'd jerk awake in panic. Now, oftentimes when he came into the room, he had to wake her.

Gentle nudge of the shoulder. Stroke along the cheek. The warm feel of the washcloth. The careful tending of her body. He cleaned her. He prayed over her. He made her whole.

Back on Juice's corner, the girls would trade stories about the bad johns out there. Who to watch out for. Who you would never see coming. There was the one who stuck a knife in your face. The one who tried to put his whole fist inside you. The one who wore a diaper. The one who wanted to paint your fingernails.

In the scheme of things, was this guy really that bad?

present day

TUESDAY

The morning sun was just winking open its eye when Will raked back the passenger's seat in Faith's Mini. A body had been found, probably the missing Georgia Tech student, and he was wasting time adjusting knobs on a clown car so that his head wouldn't press against the roof.

Faith waited until he was putting on his seatbelt to speak. "You look awful."

Will glanced at her. She was wearing her GBI regs: khaki pants, navy blue shirt, and her Glock strapped to her thigh. "Thank you."

Faith backed the car down the driveway. The wheels bumped over the curb. She didn't say anything else, which was unusual. Faith tended to chat. She tended to pry. For some reason, she was doing neither this morning. Will should've been worried about this, but there were only so many burdens he could take on at once. His useless night in the basement. His argument with Sara. The fact that his father was out of prison. Whatever Amanda was hiding from him. That there was a dead body at Techwood. That he had kissed his wife.

Will put his fingers to his mouth again. He'd wiped off Angie's lipstick with a paper towel, but he could still taste the bitter chemical residue.

Faith said, "There's an accident on this side of North Avenue. Do you mind if I take the long way through Ansley?"

Will shook his head.

"Did you not get any sleep last night?"

"Off and on."

"You missed a place on your—" She touched the side of her cheek. When Will didn't respond, she flipped down the visor in front of him.

Will stared at his reflection in the mirror. There was a small strip of beard he'd missed with the razor this morning. He looked at his eyes. They were bloodshot. No wonder people kept telling him he looked bad.

"This Techwood murder," Faith began. "Donnelly was the first responder."

Will flipped up the visor. Detective Leo Donnelly had been Faith's partner when she worked homicide with the APD. He was slightly annoying, but his greater sin was mediocrity. "Have you talked to him?"

"No. Just Amanda." She paused, as if to give Will the opportunity to ask what Amanda had said. After a few silent seconds, she told him, "I know about your father."

Will stared out the window. Faith had taken more than the long way. There were better routes to bypass North Avenue on the way to Techwood. She had navigated the back roads to Monroe Drive. They were skirting Piedmont Park and heading toward Ansley. It was six o'clock in the morning. There was no accident on North.

She said, "Mama told me last night. She needed me to make a phone call."

Will watched the houses and apartment buildings go by. They passed the vet's office where Betty got her shots.

"There's a guy I used to date way back when. I think you met him once. Sam Lawson. He's a reporter for the AJC."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. Will didn't want to think about the why behind Evelyn Mitchell's request. He assumed Amanda was making some kind of Machiavellian move, trying to get ahead of whatever the paper was going to print. Sara read the AJC every morning. She was the only person Will knew who still got the paper delivered. Was this how Sara was going to find out? Will could imagine the phone call. If she called. Maybe she wouldn't. Maybe Sara would see this as an easy opportunity to get out of whatever they had started.

Faith said, "That's how Amanda found out about your father's parole." She paused, again anticipating a response. "Sam called her office and asked for a quote. He wanted to know how she felt about him getting out." Faith stopped at the red light. "He's not going to run the story. I fed him some details on a biker gang APD busted for running crank out of a charter school. It's a front-page story. Sam won't circle back."

Will stared at the darkened strip of Ansley Mall. The upscale stores weren't open yet. Their lights glowed in the low dawn. He felt a strange sensation, like he was being driven to the hospital for surgery. Some part of his body would be removed. He would have to recover from that. He would have to find a way to acclimate his senses so they did not feel the gaping hole.

Faith asked, "What did you do to your hands?"

Will tried to bend his fingers. It hurt just flexing them. His ankle throbbed with every beat of his heart. His basement excursion was being felt by every joint in his body.

"Anyway." Faith swung through the steep curve that took them up Fourteenth Street. "I looked up his case."

Will was more than familiar with his father's crimes.

"He dodged a bullet. Furman v. Georgia was in the early seventies."

"Seventy-two," Will provided. The landmark Supreme Court case had temporarily suspended the death penalty. A few more years either side and Will's father would've been put to death by the State of Georgia.

He said, "Gary Gilmore was the first man executed after Furman."

"Spree killer, right? Up in Utah?" Faith loved reading about mass murderers. It was an unfortunate hobby that often came in handy.

Will asked, "Is it a spree if it's only two people?"

"I think two qualifies so long as the timing is close."

"I thought that it had to be three."

"I think that's just for serial killers." Faith took out her iPhone. She typed with her thumb as she waited to make an illegal turn onto Peachtree.

Will stared up Fourteenth Street. He couldn't see the hotel from his vantage point, but he knew that the Four Seasons was two blocks away. That was probably why Faith was making the turn. She knew that his father was staying at the hotel. Will wondered if he was still in bed. The man had been in prison for over thirty years. It was probably impossible for him to sleep late. Maybe he'd already ordered his breakfast from room service. Angie said he used the gym every morning. He was probably running on the treadmill, watching one of the morning shows and planning his day.

"Here we go. Two or more qualifies as a spree." Faith dropped her iPhone back into the cup holder and turned against the light. "Can we talk about your father now?"

Will said, "Did you know that Peachtree Street is Georgia's continental divide?" He pointed to the side of the road. "Rain that falls on that side of the road goes to the Atlantic. Rain on this side goes to the Gulf. Maybe I've got the sides mixed up, but you get the gist."

"That's fascinating, Will."

"I kissed Angie."

Faith nearly ran up onto the sidewalk. She jerked the car back into the lane. She was silent for a while before she muttered, "You fucking idiot."

That felt more like it.

"What are you going to do?"

"I don't know." He stared out the window again. They were heading toward the thick of downtown. "I think I have to tell Sara."

"No, you most certainly do not," she countered. "Are you crazy? She'll kick your ass to the curb."

She probably should. There was no way that Will could explain to Sara that the oldest cliché in the world happened to be true this one time: the kiss meant nothing. For Will's part, it had been a reminder that Sara was the only woman he wanted to be with; maybe the first woman he'd ever really wanted to be with. For Angie's part, the kiss had been tantamount to a dog raising its leg on a fire hydrant.

Faith asked, "Do you want to be with Angie?"

"No." He shook his head. "No."

"Was there anything else?"

Will remembered he'd touched her breast. "Not—" He wasn't going to get into specifics with Faith. "There was no contact between—"

"Okay, I get it." She turned onto North Avenue. "Jesus, Will."

He waited for her to continue.

"You can't tell Sara."

"I can't hide things from her."

She laughed so loud his ears hurt. "Are you kidding me? Does Sara know about your father? Does she know that he—"

"No."

Faith did not bother to hide her incredulity. "Well then, don't let this be the one thing you tell her the truth about."

"It's different."

"Do you think Angie will tell her?"

Will shook his head. Angie's moral code wasn't easily decipherable, but Will knew she would never tell Sara about the kiss. It was much better to use it to torture Will.

Faith cut straight to the point. "If it's not going to happen again and it didn't mean anything, then you're just going to have to live with the guilt. Or live without Sara."

Will couldn't talk about this anymore. He stared out the window again. They were stopped at a red light. The lights were on at the Varsity. In a few hours, the curb men would be out sweeping the lot, slapping numbers on cars and taking orders. Mrs. Flannigan used to bring the older kids to the Varsity once a month. It was a reward for good behavior.

Faith asked, "Have you ever tried to talk to the detectives who worked your mother's case?"

"One disappeared. Somebody thought he moved to Miami. The other died from AIDS in the early eighties."

"Did either of them have family?"

"No one I could find." Honestly, Will hadn't looked that hard. It was like picking at a scab. There came a point when you started to draw blood.

"I can't believe how many conversations I've had with you over the last two years, and you never told me about this."

Will left her to wonder why on her own.

Faith crossed the interstate. The athlete dorms that had been built for the Olympics had the Georgia Tech logo on them now. The old stadium was being remodeled. The streets were freshly paved. Brick inlays carpeted the sidewalks. Even this early in the morning, students were out jogging. Faith turned at the next light. She was more than familiar with the area. Her son was currently enrolled at Georgia Tech. Her mother had gotten her doctorate here. Faith had finished her four-year degree at the university so she could qualify for employment with the GBI.

Faith slid a piece of notebook paper out from her visor. Will saw that she'd scribbled directions on it. She slowed the car, mumbling, "Centennial Park North ... here we go." Finally, she turned onto a side street, downshifting as they went up a hill. The area was filled with upscale brick apartment buildings and townhouses. The cars on the street were nice—newer Toyotas and Fords with an occasional BMW thrown in. The grass was trimmed. The eaves and windows were painted a crisp white. Satellite dishes dotted every other balcony. The compound was designed to be mixed income, which meant a handful of poor people lived in the less desirable units and the rest went for top dollar. Will imagined that some of the better-off students lived here rather than the dorms, where Faith's son resided.

"Zell Miller Center," Faith read from the sign. "Clark Howell Community Building. Here we go." She slowed the car to a crawl. The directions weren't really needed anymore. Two cruisers blocked the street. Police tape cordoned off a group of residents. Most were in pajamas and robes. A few of the joggers had stopped to find out what was happening.

Faith had to drive down several blocks to find a space. She pulled up onto a berm and jerked up the parking brake. She asked Will, "Are you okay?"

He was going to ignore the question, but that didn't seem fair. "We'll see," he managed, then got out of the car before she could say anything else.

The streetlights were still on, supplementing the rising sun. Two newscopters hovered overhead. Their whirring blades chopped the air into white noise. More reporters were camped out down the road. Cameras were set up on tripods.

Reporters were checking their makeup, scribbling their notes.

Will didn't wait for Faith. He headed back toward the crime scene, where he could see Amanda Wagner was waiting.

Her arm was in a sling, the only indication that she'd spent the night in the hospital. She stood on the sidewalk dressed in her usual monochromatic skirt, blouse, and jacket. Two burly patrolmen were looking down at her, nodding as she gave them orders. They looked like football players huddled before a snap.

As Will and Faith approached Amanda, the patrolmen jogged off toward the bystanders, probably to get names and photos so they could run them through the database. Amanda was old school with all her investigations. She didn't rely on a blood sample or a stray hair to sway a jury. She worked the case until she got a resolution that no logical human being could ever doubt.

She also didn't bother with small talk. "I don't want you here."

"Then why did you call me?"

"Because I knew you wouldn't stay away."

Amanda didn't wait for a response. She turned on her heel, heading toward the community building. Will easily matched her brisk pace. Uncharacteristically, Faith kept her distance, trailing several feet behind.

Amanda said, "We're covered up in red tape. As you know, this whole area used to be a slum. The state emptied it out for the Olympics. The city got its finger in the pie. Tech got a piece of it. The Parks Department had its say. The Housing Authority. The Historical Register, which is a joke if there ever was one. We've got more jurisdictions than news vans. APD is supplementing for now, but it's our techs and our ME handling the evidence."

"I want to sit in on the autopsy."

"It'll be hours before—"

"I'll wait."

"Do you really think that's a good idea?"

Will thought it was a terrible idea, but that wasn't going to stop him. "You need to bring him in for questioning."

"Why would I do that?"

The fact that her voice sounded so reasonable made Will want to punch her. "You read my father's file."

She stopped, looking up at him. "Yes."

"You think it's a coincidence that he got out of prison and a dead student was found dumped at Techwood?"

"Coincidences happen all the time." Her usual certainty was showing some cracks. "I can't bring him in without probable cause, Will. Due process? The Fourth Amendment? Any of these inalienable rights ringing a bell?"

"That's never stopped you before."

"I've found it's within the purview of rich white men to avoid such unpleasanties."

Will realized that she'd backed him into a corner. "Still—"

"There's nothing more to say." Amanda continued walking. "We have a tentative ID on Ashleigh Snyder. They found her purse in the Dumpster. Her credit cards were there but her license was missing. So was her cash."

"That sounds familiar."

"Bless the Sunshine Laws." Georgia's freedom of information act was one of the most liberal in the country. Inmates were especially fond of the law.

Will said, "He's staying at the Four Seasons Hotel."

"I'm aware of that," she acknowledged. "We lost track of him for two hours yesterday afternoon, but I've made certain that won't happen again."

"He's been out almost two months."

Amanda didn't immediately answer. "I've never understood time off for good behavior. It's prison. Shouldn't you be on your best behavior at all times?"

"No one told me when he got out."

"That's the thing about having a sealed juvenile record, Will. They aren't allowed to notify you unless you ask them to."

"He was supposed to die in there."

"I know."

One of the patrolmen called out, "Dr. Wagner?"

Amanda said, "You two go on." She waited for the cop to join her.

Will kept walking. Faith had to jog to keep up. She asked, "What was that about?"

He could only shake his head as they entered the mouth of the parking lot. The ground sloped downward. In the back of the lot, a group of detectives formed a half circle around the body. The woman was in front of a large Dumpster area. Brick walls horseshoed the metal container. The tall metal doors stood open. The lock was hanging off the latch, the ring broken. Someone had already marked it with a yellow tag so it could be catalogued as evidence.

Will glanced around, feeling watched. Or maybe he was just being paranoid. He scanned the area. The community center was on the opposite side of the parking lot. More apartments edged the perimeter. Their white garage doors were like teeth against the gum of the red brick. There was a playground in the distance, with brightly colored tunnels and swings. The Coca-Cola building loomed on the horizon.

If he squinted at the view back across the interstate, he could pick out the familiar salmon-colored façade of the Four Seasons Hotel.

"Another case solved by the glorious GBI." Leo Donnelly laughed around the cigarette in his mouth. As usual, the homicide detective was dressed in a tan suit that was probably already wrinkled when he picked it up off the floor this morning. His new partner, a young guy named Jamal Hodge, nodded at Faith.

Leo winked at her. "Lookin' good across the chest, Mitchell. I guess you're still nursing?"

"Fuck off, Leo." Faith took her notebook out of her purse. "When'd the call come in?"

Leo pulled out his own notebook. "Four thirty-eight in the cheery a.m. Janitor comes on shift, sees her and freaks. His name's Otay Keehole."

"Utay Keo," Jamal corrected.

"Lookit Poindexter here." Leo shot him a nasty look. "Ooo-Tay is a student at Tech. Twenty-four years old. Lives with his baby mama. No priors."

Faith asked, "How's he look for this?"

Jamal supplied, "Not likely."

Leo made a show of closing his notebook. He took a drag on his cigarette, staring at Jamal. "Janitor's two years out of Cambodia. Works off his student visa. Voluntarily submitted to fingerprinting and DNA. No record. No motive.

I'm sure he's popped a few whores in his day—who hasn't?—but he doesn't even have a car. Took the bus here."

Will asked, "You ID'd the victim off her credit cards?"

Jamal held out his hands, indicating Leo should answer.

"We're pretty sure it's Snyder," Leo said. "Face is a mess, but the blonde hair is a giveaway."

Will asked, "Have you notified the family?"

"Mom's dead. Daddy's flying back from a business trip in Salt Lake. Should be here this afternoon."

Jamal added, "We asked for dental records."

"Great, thanks," Faith mumbled. She was probably thinking about the father's long flight home, the moment at the morgue when his life would forever be changed.

They all turned back to the Dumpster. The crowd had dispersed so the crime scene techs could begin the arduous process of cataloguing the scene.

Will looked down at the woman's twisted body. Long blonde hair draped across her face. She was on her back. Her arms were turned, wrists open to the sky. Her face was a bloody pulp, probably unrecognizable to even her closest friends. Her fingernails were painted bright red. Blood glued her clothes to her skin. Will could guess what was underneath the tight T-shirt and flowered skirt.

Leo said, "Here's something you don't see every day: guy pummeled her gut until her intestines shit out. You can't find that kind of thing on YouTube." He chuckled to himself. "At least, not until I figure out how to work the camera on my phone."

"Lord help us," Jamal muttered. He headed toward Charlie Reed, the GBI crime scene investigator.

"Come on, Hodge," Leo called to his back. "It's funny."

Faith said, "Smart, Leo. You really want to piss off the deputy chief's grandson?"

Will glanced at Faith. Her voice sounded a little shaky. She had never been good around bodies, but through sheer determination she held her own. One crack in her shell and Leo or someone like him would turn Faith into a joke every squad room was laughing about by morning roll call. Faith had once told Will that working with Leo was like watching a wind-up monkey that couldn't quite get the cymbals to meet.

Will knew better than to ask if she was okay. Instead, he knelt beside the body, keeping his distance so he wouldn't taint the area. The crime scene photographers weren't waiting for the sun. Their digital cameras and computers were laid out on a folding table. One of the women turned on the diesel generator. The xenon lights flickered. The victim's hand showed stark against the asphalt. Her red manicured nails glistened as if they were still wet.

Faith asked Leo, "What's this building? Is it still a community center?"

"Dunno." Leo shrugged. "Guess they named it after that guy on the radio."

Will stood up too quickly. He fought a wave of dizziness. "Clark Howell was the publisher of The Atlanta Constitution."

"No shit?" Leo asked.

"He's chock-full of fascinating trivia today," Faith said. "Do you have any leads?"

"What's it to you?"

Faith put her hands on her hips. "Don't be an asshole, Leo. You know this is a state case. Do you have any leads, or should I ask Jamal?"

Leo reluctantly offered, "I made some calls, checked with downtown. There's nobody on our books what would knock the shit out of a girl like this." He laughed at his own joke. "Literally."

"She have any enemies?"

"Y'all should know more about that than me."

"What about a drug problem?"

Leo sniffed, rubbing his nose. "Nothing serious, from what I've heard."

"Coke or meth?"

"She's a student. What do you think?"

"Meth," Faith said. "And watch the generalities, Leo. My kid goes to Tech. He doesn't hit anything harder than Red Bull."

"Sure."

"Faith," Amanda called. She was at the edge of the parking lot, waving them over. Faith shot Leo a nasty look as they headed toward Amanda.

Leo yelled at their backs, "No, don't thank me, Officers. It was my pleasure."

Amanda was digging around in her purse when they joined her. She pulled out her BlackBerry. The case was still cracked from her fall. She scrolled through her emails while she talked. "Patrol found a jogger who saw a suspicious green minivan circling the area shortly after four this morning."

"He just came forward?" Faith looked at her watch. "Was he jogging for two hours?"

"That sounds like a good question to start with. He lives there, apartment two-six-twenty." Amanda indicated the building across the street. "Make sure you get him on paper. All the t's crossed and i's dotted."

Will said, "I'll talk to him." He made to go, but Amanda stopped him.

"Faith, you do this."

Faith gave him a look of apology before heading toward the apartment building.

Amanda held up a finger, silencing Will. She read a few more emails before dropping her BlackBerry into her purse. "You know you can't work this case."

"I don't see how you're going to stop me."

"This has to look good on paper. We can't have it falling apart in court."

"It held up in court the last time and he still got out."

"Welcome to the criminal justice system. I rather thought you were familiar with it by now."

Will stared across the interstate. Rush hour was gearing up. Cars were starting to clog the fourteen lanes. He saw a sign for one of the Emory hospitals. Sara had gone to Emory University. Grady was part of their teaching system. She would be getting ready for work right now. Showering, drying her hair. Will usually walked the dogs before he left. He wondered if she missed that.

Amanda said, "Give me time to do this right, Will. It has to be done right."

Will shook his head. He didn't care about the means, just the end. "We need to work his case from the beginning."

"What do you think I've been doing?" she asked. "I've had two teams on this since I found out. We're dealing with a thirty-plus-year time gap in a city that tears itself down every five years. His old stomping ground is currently a twelve-story office complex.”

“I’ll check it. Faith can go with me.”

“It’s already been checked top to bottom.”

“Not by me.”

She wasn’t looking at him. Like Will, she was staring over the interstate. “Motive, means, and opportunity.” It was Amanda’s mantra.

Will said, “You know he’s got all three.”

She gave a tight nod of her head. If Will hadn’t been watching, he would’ve missed it. He studied her profile. She seemed to be as tired as he was. There were dark circles under her eyes. Her makeup was caked into the creases around her eyes and mouth.

She said, “I have to say, I love what you did with the basement.”

Will’s hands clenched. The cuts opened up along his fingers.

“Did you find what you were looking for?”

His jaw popped when he opened his mouth to speak. “Why were you there?”

“That’s a very interesting question.”

“How long have you known about my father?”

“You work for me, Will. It’s my job to know everything about you.”

“Why did that reporter call you?”

“It makes for a good story, I suppose—your chosen path of law and order. Your rise from the ashes. Atlanta’s symbol is the phoenix. What a fitting dovetail.”

He turned and headed toward North Avenue, the bridge over the interstate. Amanda’s stride was half as long as Will’s. She had to work to match his pace.

She asked, “Where are you going?”

“To talk to my father.”

“To what end?”

“You’ve read his file. You know he has a pattern. He kills one, he keeps one. He’s probably already picked her out.”

“Shall I put out an APB on a missing prostitute?”

She was mocking him. “You know he’s looking for another girl.”

“I told you we’ve got eyes on him. He hasn’t left his room.”

“Except for yesterday afternoon.”

She stopped trying to keep up. “You will not talk to him.”

Will turned around. Amanda never raised her voice. She didn’t scream. She didn’t stamp her foot. She never cursed. She managed to scare everyone by reputation. For the first time in fifteen years, he saw through her. She was nothing, really. An old woman with her arm in a sling and secrets she would carry to her grave.

She said, “I’ve issued a standing order to have you arrested the minute you step one foot in that hotel. Understood?”

He stared his hate into her. “I should’ve left you to rot in that basement.”

“Oh, Will.” Her voice was filled with regret. “I have a feeling that by the end of this, we’re both going to wish you had.”

Present Day

SUZANNA FORD

She missed Dancing with the Stars. She missed Bobo, her little dog who'd died when she was ten. She missed her grandmother, who'd died when Suzanna was eleven, and her grandfather, who'd died a few months later. She missed Adam, the goldfish who'd died the night they brought him home from the store. Suzanna had found him in the tank just floating on his side. His eye was blank. She could see her reflection in it.

Suzanna called the store to complain.

"Just flush 'em down the toilet," the manager said. "Come by tomorrow and we'll give you a new one."

Suzanna had felt uneasy at the prospect. It felt wrong. Did Adam mean nothing? Was he that replaceable? Just plop another fish in the tank and forget he even existed? Call that one Adam, too. Feed him Adam's food. Let him swim through Adam's secret treasure box and pink coral castle?

In the end, there was nothing else to do. Suzanna flushed him down the toilet. As the water circled around the bowl, she saw his fin flip up. The glass orb of his eyeball turned to her, and she had seen something like panic.

In her dreams, Suzanna was the fish. She was Adam One, because of course the temptation was too great—they had gone back the next day and gotten a free Adam Two.

That was the entirety of the dream:

Suzanna One, helpless, staring up at the ceiling as she spun, spun, spun quickly down the drain.

July 14, 1975

MONDAY

Amanda leaned against her Plymouth as she waited for Evelyn in the parking garage of the Sears building. The air did not move in the underground facility. The coolness afforded from the poured concrete walls was no match for the scorching heat. Even at seven in the morning, Amanda could feel sweat dripping down her neck and into her collar.

Neither she nor Evelyn had been up for the barbecue after leaving the morgue on Saturday evening. Hank Bennett. The misidentified girl. The red fingernails. The broken hyoid bone. It was a lot to process, and neither of them seemed up to having a coherent conversation. They'd both talked in monosyllables, Amanda because of the things she'd seen with Pete Hanson, and Evelyn—most probably—because she'd been unsettled about seeing Rick Landry again. No matter their reasons, Evelyn had gone home to her husband and Amanda had gone home to her empty apartment.

If Sunday brought anything, it was a welcome sense of normalcy. Amanda had cooked breakfast for her father. They'd gone to church. She'd cooked Sunday dinner. All the while, Duke had been notably more cheerful. He'd made a few jokes about the preacher. He was feeling bullish on his case. He'd spoken with his lawyer again. Lars Oglethorpe's reinstatement was definitely good news for the men Reginald Eaves had fired.

Amanda doubted it was good news for her.

Evelyn's station wagon made a tight turn, the tires squealing against the concrete. She backed into the space beside the Plymouth, calling through the open window, "Did Kenny call you yesterday?"

Amanda felt a shock of panic. "Why would Kenny call me?"

"I gave him your number."

For a few seconds, Amanda was too flustered to do anything but stare. "Why would you give him my phone number?"

"Because he asked for it, silly. Why do you sound so surprised? And why are you just standing there?"

Amanda shook her head as she got into the car. Men like Kenny Mitchell didn't ask for her phone number. "That's very nice of you to put him up to this, but let's not waste time on something that's not going to happen."

"You can—" Evelyn stopped, but only for a moment before she blurted out, "You can wear Tampax, right?"

Amanda pressed her fingers into her eyelids, not caring whether or not she smudged her makeup. "If I say yes, can we please change the subject?"

Evelyn wouldn't be daunted. "You know, Pete's a real doctor. He can write you a prescription, no questions asked, and if you slip the guy at the Plaza Pharmacy a few extra bucks, he won't be a jerk about it."

Amanda fanned her face. The heat was even more stifling inside the car. She tried not to think about her telephone ringing in her empty apartment yesterday.

"It's legal now, sweetheart. You don't have to be married to get birth control anymore."

Amanda's laugh was genuine this time. "I think you're jumping to a lot of conclusions."

"Maybe, but it's fun, isn't it?"

It was humiliating, actually, but Amanda tried to hide that fact by looking at her watch again. "Did this consume your entire Sunday, or did you manage to think at all about what we've been doing?"

Evelyn rolled her eyes. "Are you kidding? It's all that's been on my mind for the last week. I was so distracted this morning I put salt instead of sugar in Bill's coffee. Poor man drank half the cup before he realized what I'd done." She paused for a breath. "What about you?"

"I've been going over Butch's notes." Amanda pulled the homicide detective's notebook out of her purse. "See this here?" She pointed to the page for Evelyn's benefit. The letters CI were circled twice.

"Confidential informant," Evelyn said. She flipped back through the notebook. "Does he say anything else about it? A name, maybe?"

"Nothing, but a lot of Butch's cases rely on CIs." Most of them did, actually. The man was very good at finding criminals and lowlifes who were willing to parlay information into a get-out-of-jail-free card. "He never names his sources."

"Oh, that's sneaky." She scanned the pages, stopping on a crude drawing of the apartment where Jane Delray had lived. "He left out the bathroom. Did he even search the place?" She answered her own question. "Of course he didn't. Why would he?"

Amanda checked the time again. She didn't want to be late for roll call. "We should go over what we're doing today. I can call my friend at the Housing Authority when I get to work. Maybe we can find out who rented that apartment."

Evelyn paused for a moment as she switched gears. "I'll call Cindy Murray at the Five and see if she has time to check the confiscated-license box for a Lucy Bennett. At least we'll have a photograph of her."

"I don't know what good it'll do. Pete will have to sign off on the ID. It came from her own brother." Neither she nor Evelyn had the nerve to contradict Hank Bennett's identification of his sister. "Bennett hasn't laid eyes on her in five or six years. Do you think he knew it wasn't Lucy?"

"I think all he cared about was not being late for his dinner date."

They were both silent. Amanda felt a ping-pong sensation inside her head. Thoughts kept bouncing around, getting lost. It was just too much to keep up with.

Evelyn was obviously feeling the same. She said, "Bill and I started a puzzle last night—bridges of the Pacific Northwest. Zeke picked it out for Father's Day last month—and I thought, 'This is exactly how I've felt all week. Like there are all of these different little pieces to a puzzle floating around out there, and if I could only put them together, maybe I'd be able to see the full picture.' "

"I know what you mean. All I do is ask myself questions, and I can't seem to get a satisfactory answer to any of them."

"Hey, I've got a crazy idea."

"You cannot imagine my surprise."

Evelyn gave her a sarcastic grimace, then leaned into the back seat of the station wagon.

"What are you doing?"

She snaked her body around into the back seat. Her legs went up. Amanda swatted the woman's feet out of her face. She scanned the parking lot, praying they were not being watched.

"Evelyn," she said. "What on earth?"

"Got it." Finally, she shimmied back into her seat. She had a pack of construction paper in her hands. "Zeke's crayons melted into the carpet. Bring your pen." She pushed open the door.

Amanda got out of the car and followed her around to the front of the wagon. Evelyn took a piece of paper off the top of the pack and, using Amanda's pen, wrote, "HANK BENNETT" on the page. Next, she took another page and wrote, "LUCY BENNETT," then on another put, "JANE DELRAY." She added "MARY" and "KITTY TREADWELL" into the mix, then "HODGE," "JUICE/DWAYNE MATHISON," and finally, "ANDREW TREADWELL."

"What are you doing?" Amanda asked.

"Puzzle pieces." She spread the multicolored pages out on the Falcon's hood. "Let's put it together."

Amanda took in the disparate words. The idea wasn't so crazy after all. "We should do it chronologically." She moved the names around as she spoke. "Hank Bennett came into the station, and then Sergeant Hodge sent us to Techwood. Make a new one for Tech." Evelyn scribbled the word onto a new sheet. "We need to subcategorize these." Amanda took the pen and started filling in details: dates, times, what they'd been told. The Fury's engine clicked in the heat. The metal hood singed her skin.

Evelyn suggested, "I'll make a timeline."

Amanda handed her the pen. She pointed to the different pages as she called out the sequence. "Hank Bennett goes to Sergeant Hodge last Monday. Hodge immediately sends us out to Techwood to take a rape report." She looked at Evelyn. "Hodge won't tell us why he sent us in the first place. Obviously, there wasn't a rape. Why did he send us there?"

"I'll ask him again this morning, but he wouldn't tell me the last four times."

Amanda felt the need to tell her, "You were very brave to do that."

"Fat lot of good it did." Evelyn waved away the compliment. "Juice, the pimp, doesn't belong in here."

"Unless he's the one who killed Jane."

"That doesn't seem likely. Juice was probably in jail when it happened. Or having the crap beaten out of him for resisting arrest."

"Okay, let's push him up here as a remote possibility." Amanda moved Juice to the periphery. "Next: We're at the apartment in Techwood. Jane tells us that there are three girls missing: Lucy Bennett, Kitty—who we later find out is Treadwell—and a girl named Mary, last name unknown.”

“Right.” Evelyn wrote down the information, shooting their names off Jane Delray’s.

“Then, a few days later, Jane is murdered.”

“But she was misidentified as Lucy,” Evelyn corrected. “I’ll put an asterisk beside her name, but we should keep it this way just for clarity’s sake.”

“Right. A person who is thought to be Lucy Bennett is murdered.”

“I wonder if the brother had a big life insurance policy on her?”

Amanda supposed being married to an insurance man put these ideas into Evelyn’s head. “Is there a way to check? A registry?”

“I’ll ask Bill, but just talking it out, I think given Lucy’s life, why murder her when she would eventually kill herself with drugs?” Evelyn looked down at the timeline. “It’s not much of a motive.”

“Motive.” There was something they hadn’t considered. “Why would someone want to murder Jane?”

“Are we assuming the killer knew it was Jane whom he was murdering?”

Amanda’s head was starting to hurt. “I think we have to assume that until we find out otherwise.”

“Okay. Motive. Jane was very annoying.”

“True,” Amanda agreed. “But the last person she annoyed other than us was Juice, and if there’s one thing I know about pimps, it’s that they don’t kill their girls. They want them working. They’re product.”

“I’ll call the jail and see when Juice got out, just to make triple sure.” Evelyn tapped the pen against her chin. “Maybe the murderer was someone who saw Jane talking to us at Techwood? The whole compound lit up when we arrived. There’s no way it wasn’t broadcast to the rooftops that Jane was talking to two police officers.”

Amanda felt unsettled by the thought that she might’ve been partly responsible for the girl’s death. “Write that down as a possibility.”

“I hate to think we had anything to do with it. Then again, she wasn’t exactly baking cookies for the PTA.”

“No,” Amanda agreed, but Evelyn had only seen the pictures. “Have you ever had a manicure?”

Evelyn looked at her fingernails, which were clear-coated, just like Amanda’s. “Bill treated me to one last Christmas. I can’t say that I enjoyed having a stranger touch my hands.”

“Jane’s fingernails were perfect. They were filed and polished. I couldn’t’ve done a better job myself.”

“That manicure was ridiculously expensive. I can’t imagine Jane having the money.”

“No, and if she did, she’d spend it on drugs, not getting her fingernails polished.” Amanda remembered, “Pete said something interesting about the attacker. He said the man was angry, uncontrolled.”

“How in the world can he tell that?”

“From the way Jane looked. She was beaten all over.” Amanda tried to think it through, but she found it was easier to talk it out to Evelyn. “I guess we should be asking ourselves what kind of person is capable of this. And then, ask how he would do it. He obviously used his fists, but he had the hammer, too. He busted open the lock on the access door to the roof. But then, we need to consider how he was able to get the better of someone like Jane. She wasn't bright, but she was street-smart."

"Who, how, and why," Evelyn summarized. "Those are very good questions. If Juice isn't the answer to them, then who is? Someone Jane has seen before. A regular customer who knows where she lives." Evelyn tapped the pen again. "But, then, this is what we're saying: He knocked on the door. He gave her a manicure. Then he threw her off the roof."

"He strangled her before he threw her off the roof."

Evelyn asked, "Pete told you that?" Amanda nodded. "That seems like a more plausible scenario. Jane screamed like a stuck pig when you kicked her, and that was barely a tap."

"You didn't say that at the time."

"I was scared," Evelyn admitted. "I'm sorry."

"It's all right," Amanda told her. "Maybe we could ask around and see if any johns are into choking."

"I know a gal who works undercover downtown. I'll see what she knows. But even if there is a guy out there who likes choking women—and something tells me there's more than one—how are we going to find his real name? And if by some miracle we do find his name, how on earth would we link him to Jane?"

Amanda offered, "Pete scraped some skin out from under Jane's fingernails. He said he could match the blood type against a suspect. See if he's a secretor or a nonsecretor."

"Eighty percent of the population has secretor status. Nearly forty percent is type O-positive. That's hardly narrowing it down."

"I didn't know that," Amanda admitted. Evelyn was much better at statistics than she was. "Let's go back to the puzzle before we're both late for work." Amanda picked up where they'd left off in the timeline. "Next, we met Mr. Blue Suit, aka Hank Bennett, at the morgue. He admits he hasn't seen his sister in years, which might explain why he couldn't identify her."

"Or, he's just too arrogant to admit that he can't."

That seemed far more likely. "I still find it odd that Lucy Bennett didn't have a record. She's been on the game at least a year, probably more."

"Neither does Kitty Treadwell." Evelyn looked sheepish. "I radioed dispatch on my way here. They ran through all the variations for me. There was no record for a Kitty Treadwell."

"How about Jane Delray?"

"She had two pick-ups several years ago, but nothing recently."

"Then her fingerprints are on file."

Evelyn frowned. "No, they're not. I asked. A lot of the older records have been purged."

"That's convenient." Amanda updated the information under each girl's name. "We need to work on Andrew Treadwell. He's a lawyer. He's a friend of the mayor's. What else do we know about him?"

"Jane intimated that he was Kitty's uncle. She point-blank said that Kitty was rich, that her family was connected."

Amanda said, "That article in the newspaper listed Andrew Treadwell as having only one daughter."

"He's one of the top lawyers in the city. He's politically powerful. If he has a daughter who's been pimped out on the streets by a black man, do you really think that's something he'd advertise? He'd more likely use his money and influence to keep her hidden away."

"You're right," Amanda allowed. She stared down at the diagram. "Don't you think it's odd that Lucy and Kitty are both out on the street and one of them has a brother working for the other's uncle?"

"Maybe they met at a self-help group," Evelyn smiled. "Whores Anonymous."

Amanda rolled her eyes at the joke. "Are we still assuming that Andrew Treadwell is the one who sent Hank Bennett to talk to Hodge last Monday?"

"I am. Are you?"

Amanda nodded again. "Which may support your theory that Andrew Treadwell doesn't want it to get out that he's related to Kitty. We could be looking at it wrong. Who does Treadwell want to hide the relationship from if not his buddies at City Hall?"

"Bennett is quite a piece of work," Evelyn mumbled. "He's one of the most arrogant asses I've met. And that's saying a lot considering the guys we work with."

Amanda tried to recall Hank Bennett's terse answers to their questions outside the morgue. She should've written them down. "Bennett said he sent his sister a letter at the Union Mission. Do you remember him saying when?"

"Yes. He mailed the letter to the Mission when his father passed away last year—this time last year. Which reminds me: Jane said Lucy has been missing for about a year."

Amanda wrote down this information under Lucy's name. "When you asked Bennett if he knew the name Kitty Treadwell, he told us to watch where we put our noses."

"Trask," Evelyn remembered. "That was the man he talked with at the Union Mission."

"He said Trask or Trent," Amanda corrected. The exchange stuck in her head because her mother's maiden name was Trent.

"We have to call him something for now," Evelyn pointed out.

"Trask," Amanda suggested.

"Okay, Trask told Bennett that he gave the letter to Lucy, which means he must know Lucy. If he works at the Union Mission, he might know all of our girls. Oh, Amanda—" She sounded devastated. "Why didn't we think to go to the Union Mission in the first place? All the hookers go there when they need a break. It's their Acapulco."

"The mission is just up the street," Amanda reminded her. "We can still talk to Trask, see if he remembers anything about Lucy—or Jane."

"If we're lucky, they'll tell us Lucy's alive and well and on such-and-such corner, and why are people saying she's been murdered." Evelyn looked at her watch. "I have to check in at Model City, but I could meet you there in half an hour."

"That should give me enough time to call the Housing Authority and figure out what I'm going to do with Peterson."

"I'm sure Vanessa won't mind taking him."

Amanda tucked her pen back in her purse. "I feel that's a bad situation brewing.”

“Maybe. Listen, I’ll try to question Hodge again, but I doubt that’ll get me anywhere.” She scooped up the pieces of construction paper and stacked them together. “I just have such a bad feeling about all of this.”

“What do you mean?”

“I think Lucy Bennett’s dead either way.”

“Possibly, but it could be drugs, not malfeasance.”

“Have you read about all those girls in Texas who disappeared around the I-45 corridor?”

“What?”

“A dozen or more,” Evelyn told her. “They’re not even sure where the bodies are.”

“Where do you hear these things?”

There was no shame in her smile. “True Crime magazine.”

Amanda sighed as she watched Evelyn climb into her station wagon. “I’ll see you at the mission.”

“Deal.” Evelyn slowly pulled out of the parking space. “And I wouldn’t worry too much about Vanessa,” she called through the open window. “Who do you think told me about the guy behind the counter at the Plaza Pharmacy?”

“Mandy!” Vanessa called as soon as she walked into the station.

Amanda pushed her way through the crowd. The station was full. Roll call was a few minutes off. Amanda glanced into the sergeant’s office, but it was empty.

“Hurry!” Vanessa was sitting in back again, practically bouncing in her chair. She was wearing slacks and a flowery blouse. Her gun was holstered on her hip. She was dressed in men’s shoes. Amanda was beginning to wonder if she was worried about the wrong sex where Vanessa was concerned. At least she was still wearing a bra.

“Lookit what I got.” Vanessa held up a credit card as if it was a bar of gold. Amanda recognized the logo of the Franklin Simon department store. And then her jaw dropped at the punch-typed gold letters spelling out VANESSA LIVINGSTON underneath.

“How did you ...” Amanda sank down in her chair. She was almost afraid to touch the card. Then she did. “Is it real?”

“Yep.” Vanessa beamed.

Amanda could not stop staring at the card. “Is this a joke?” She glanced around to see if anyone was watching. No one seemed to care. “How did you get this?”

“Rachel Foster over in dispatch told me about it. All you have to do is show them six months’ worth of pay stubs.”

“Are you kidding me?” Amanda hadn’t been able to get her apartment without Duke guaranteeing the rent. If not for the city providing her a car, she’d be on foot. “They just gave it to you? Just like that?”

“That’s right.”

“They didn’t ask to speak to your husband or your father or—”

“Nope.”

Amanda was still dubious. She handed back the card. Franklin Simon was all right, but they were doomed to bankruptcy if they were handing out credit so freely. "Listen, can you do me a favor today and ride with Peterson?"

"Sure."

"Don't you want to know why?"

The guttural sound of someone vomiting filled the room. It was joined by other men making similar disgusting noises. Butch Bonnie walked into the station, his fists held up as if he was Muhammad Ali. Amanda had forgotten how ill he'd been at the crime scene last Friday. Obviously, the rest of the squad had not. People clapped and laughed. There were even cheers from the black side of the room. Butch did a sort of victory spin as he made his way toward Amanda.

He leaned on the table. "Hey, gal, you got my stuff for me?"

Amanda reached into her bag for the typed report. She dropped the pages on the table beside him.

"Why you bein' so cold?" he asked. "You on the rag?"

"It's what your partner did to Evelyn Mitchell," Amanda shot back. "He's an animal."

Butch scratched the side of his cheek. He looked rough. His clothes were wrinkled. His face was unshaven. There was a distinct odor of alcohol and stale cigarettes sweating from his pores.

Amanda stared straight ahead. "Is there anything else?"

"Jesus, Mandy. Cut him some slack. His wife's been giving him enough crap at home. He don't need to come to work and catch lip off another skirt."

She forced herself not to soften. "Your notes had a factual error."

Butch tossed a cigarette into his mouth. "Whattaya talkin' about?"

"You said you ID'd Lucy Bennett off a license in her purse. The evidence receipt didn't list a license of any type."

"Shit," he mumbled, then, "S'cuse the language." He skimmed his notebook, compared it to her typed report. "Yeah, I see it."

"How did you ID the victim?"

He lowered his voice. "Off a CI."

"Who?"

"Never you mind who," he told her. "Just fix the report."

"You know they can't change the evidence receipt. The carbons are in triplicate."

"Then change the report so it says someone recognized her." He handed back the typed report. "There was a witness on scene. Call him Jigaboo Jones. I don't care. Just make it work."

"Are you sure?" she asked. "You're the one whose signature goes at the bottom."

He looked nervous, but said, "Yeah, I'm sure. Just do it."

"Butch—" She stopped him before he could leave. "How did Hank Bennett find out his sister was dead? You usually specify that in your notes, but this time, there's nothing." Amanda pressed a bit harder. "Lucy didn't have a record, so it seems strange that you and Landry were able to locate next of kin so quickly."

He stared at her, unblinking. She could almost see the wheels turning in his head. She didn't know if Butch was just now asking himself the question or wondering why Amanda had posed it. Finally, he told her, "I don't know."

She studied him, trying to detect duplicity. "It seems like you're telling me the truth."

"Jesus, Mandy, hanging around Evelyn Mitchell's turning you into the wrong kinda gal." He pushed himself up from the table. "Get that report back to me first thing tomorrow morning." He waited for her to nod, then went to the front of the room.

"Wow," Vanessa said. She'd been strangely quiet. "What's going on with you and Butch?"

Amanda shook her head. "I need to make a phone call."

There were two telephones in the front of the room, but Amanda didn't want to make her way through the crowd. Nor did she want to run into Rick Landry, who'd just walked into the station. The clock on the wall was straight up at eight o'clock. Sergeant Woody was still not here. Amanda wasn't surprised. Woody had a reputation for hitting the bars before work. She might as well use his office.

Nothing much had changed since Luther Hodge had vacated the space. Paperwork was scattered across the blotter. The ashtray was brimming over. Woody hadn't even bothered to get a new mug for his coffee.

Amanda sat down behind the desk and dug into her purse for her address book. The black leather was cracked and peeling. She thumbed to the C's and traced her finger down to Pam Canale's number at the Housing Authority. They weren't close friends—the woman was Italian—but Amanda had helped Pam's niece out of some trouble a few years ago. Amanda was hoping the woman wouldn't mind returning the favor.

She checked the squad room before dialing Pam's number, then waited while the call was transferred.

"Canale," Pam said, but Amanda hung up. Sergeant Luther Hodge was heading back toward the office. His office.

She stood from the desk so fast that the chair hit the wall.

"Miss Wagner," Hodge said. "Has there been a promotion about which I am uninformed?"

"No," she said, then, "Sir." Amanda scuttled around the desk. "I'm sorry, sir. I was making a phone call." She stopped, trying to appear less flustered. The fact was that she was stunned. "Did you get transferred back here?"

"Yes, I did." He waited for her to move out of his path so that he could sit down. "I suppose you think I'm holding water for your father."

Amanda had been about to leave, but she couldn't now. "No, sir. I was just making a phone call." She remembered Evelyn, her boldness in confronting Hodge. "Why did you send me to Techwood last week?"

He had been about to sit at his desk. He paused midair, hand holding back his tie.

"You told us to investigate a rape. There was no rape."

Slowly, he sat down. He indicated the chair. "Have a seat, Miss Wagner."

Amanda started to close the door.

"Leave that open."

She did as she was told, sitting opposite him at the desk.

"Are you trying to intimidate me, Miss Wagner?"

"I—"

"I realize your father still has many friends in this department, but I will not be intimidated. Is that clear?"

"Intimidated?"

"Miss Wagner, I may not be from around here, but I can tell you one thing for sure. One thing you can take straight back to your daddy: this nigger ain't goin' back into the fields."

She felt her mouth working, but no words would come out.

"Dismissed."

Amanda couldn't move.

"Should I repeat my order?"

Amanda stood. She walked toward the open door. Her competing emotions compelled her to keep moving, to work this out in private, to formulate a more reasoned response than what actually came out of her mouth. "I'm just trying to do my job."

Hodge had been writing something on a piece of paper. Probably a request to have her transferred to Perry Homes. His pen stopped. He stared at her, waiting.

Words got jumbled in her mouth. "I want to work. To be good at ... I need to be good at ..." She forced herself to stop speaking long enough to collect her thoughts. "The girl you sent us out to interview. Her name was Jane Delray. She wasn't raped. She wasn't injured. There wasn't a scratch on her. She was fine."

Hodge studied her a moment. He put down his pen. He sat back in his chair, his hands clasped in front of his stomach.

"Her pimp came in. His street name is Juice. He chased Jane out of the apartment. He made suggestive overtures toward me and Evelyn. We arrested him."

Hodge continued to stare at her. Finally, he nodded.

"Last Friday, this woman was found dead at Techwood Homes. Jane Delray. It was reported as a suicide, but the coroner told me that she was strangled, then thrown from the building."

Hodge was still looking at her. "I think you're mistaken."

"No, I'm not." Even as Amanda said the words, she questioned herself. Was she certain that the victim was not Lucy Bennett? How was it possible to tell whether or not the corpse at the morgue was truly Jane Delray? Hank Bennett had been equally as certain that he was identifying his sister. But the face, the track marks, the scars on her wrists.

Amanda said, "The victim was not Lucy Bennett. It was Jane Delray."

Her words floated up into the stale air. Amanda fought the urge to equivocate. This was the hardest lesson they had learned at the academy. It was a woman's nature to be diminutive, to make peace. They'd spent hours raising their voices, giving orders rather than making requests.

Hodge steepled his fingers. "What's your next step?"

She let some of the breath out of her lungs. "I'm meeting Evelyn Mitchell at the Union Mission. All the streetwalkers end up there eventually. It's like their Mexico." Hodge's brow furrowed at the analogy. Amanda kept talking. "There has to be someone at the Union Mission who knew the girls."

He kept studying her. "Did I mishear a plural?"

Amanda bit her lip. She longed for Evelyn's presence. She was so much better at this. Still, Amanda couldn't give up now. "The man you spoke to last Monday.

The lawyer in the blue suit. His name is Hank Bennett. You thought he was sent by Andrew Treadwell.” Hodge didn’t disagree, so she continued. “I imagine he was here looking for his sister, Lucy Bennett.”

Hodge supplied, “And then, less than a week later, he found her.”

His statement hung between them. Amanda tried to analyze its meaning, but then a more pressing issue presented itself. Rick Landry barreled into the office. He reeked of whiskey. He threw his cigarette on the floor. “Tell this fucking broad to keep her nose out of my case.”

If Hodge was surprised, he didn’t show it. Instead, he asked in a perfectly reasonable voice, “And you are?”

Landry was visibly taken aback. “Rick Landry. Homicide.” He glared at Hodge. “Where’s Hoyt?”

“I imagine Sergeant Woody is drinking his breakfast downtown.”

Again, Landry was taken off guard. It was commonly held on the force that a man’s drinking problem was his own business. “This is a homicide case. Ain’t got nothin’ to do with her. Or that mouthy bitch she’s been hangin’ around with.”

“Homicide?” Hodge paused just a moment longer than necessary. “I was under the impression that Miss Bennett committed suicide.” He pushed through the paperwork on his desk, taking his time finding what he was looking for. “Yes, here’s your preliminary report. Suicide.” He held out the paper. “Is that your signature, Officer?”

“Detective.” Landry snatched the report out of his hand. “It’s what you said, preliminary.” He wadded the paper into a ball and stuck it in his pocket. “I’ll give you the final report later.”

“So, the case is still open? You believe Lucy Bennett was murdered?”

Landry glanced back at Amanda. “I need more time.”

“Take all the time you need, Detective.” Hodge held out his hands as if he was placing the world at Landry’s feet. When the man did not leave, he asked, “Is there anything else?”

Landry glowered at Amanda before making his exit. He slammed the door behind him. Hodge looked at the closed door, then back at Amanda.

She asked, “Why did Hank Bennett come here last Monday?”

“That sounds like a very good question.”

“Why did he want you to send us to Kitty’s apartment?”

“Another good question.”

“You didn’t give us a name, just an address.”

“That’s correct.” He picked up his pen. “You can skip roll call.”

Amanda remained seated. She didn’t understand.

“I said you can skip roll call, Miss Wagner.” He went back to his paperwork. When Amanda didn’t leave, he glanced up at her. “Don’t you have a case to work?”

She stood, using the arm of the chair to leverage herself up. The door was stuck. She had to jerk it open. Amanda kept her gaze ahead as she walked through the squad room and out the door. Her resolve almost broke when she was pulling the Plymouth out of the parking lot. She could see the squad through the broken pane of glass in the storefront. A few of the patrolmen watched her leave.

Amanda pulled out onto Highland. Her breathing didn’t return to normal until she was on Ponce de Leon heading toward the Union Mission. By her watch, she had another ten minutes before Evelyn joined her. Maybe Amanda could use the time to figure out what had just happened. The problem was that she didn't know where to begin. She needed time to digest it all. She also still needed to make a phone call.

The Trust Company branch on the corner of Ponce and Monroe had a bank of pay phones outside the building. Amanda pulled into the parking lot. She backed her car into a space and sat with her hands still wrapped around the wheel. None of this made sense. Why was Hodge speaking in riddles? He didn't seem to be afraid of much. Was he trying to help Amanda or trying to discourage her?

She found some coins in her wallet and grabbed her address book. Two of the pay phones were out of order. The last one took her dime. She dialed Pam's number again and listened to the rings. At twenty, she was about to give up, but Pam finally answered.

"Canale." She sounded even more harried than before.

"Pam, it's Amanda Wagner."

A few seconds passed before Pam seemed to recognize her name. "Mandy. What's going on? Oh, crap, don't tell me something's wrong with Mimi?"

Mimi Mitideri, the niece who'd almost run off with a Navy cadet. "No, nothing like that. I was calling to see if you could do me a favor."

She seemed relieved, though her day was probably filled with people asking for favors. "What do you need?"

"I was wondering if you could look up a name for me, or an apartment." Amanda realized she wasn't being very clear. She hadn't thought through the conversation. "There's an apartment at Techwood Homes—apartment C. It's on the fifth floor in the row of buildings—"

"Whoa, let me stop you there. There's no C at Techwood Homes. They're numbered."

Amanda resisted the temptation to ask her where one might find these numbers. "Could you look up a name, then? A Katherine or Kate or Kitty Treadwell?"

"We don't go by names. We go by roll numbers."

Amanda sighed. "I was afraid you'd say that." She felt the uselessness of the situation sitting like an elephant on her chest. "I'm not even sure if I've got the right name. There are—were—at least three girls living there. Maybe more."

"Wait a minute," Pam said. "Are they related?"

"I doubt it. They're working girls."

"All in the same unit?" Pam asked. "That's not allowed unless they're related. And even if they are, none of those gals ever want to room together. They lie all the time." There was a noise on Pam's end of the line. She covered the mouthpiece for a few seconds and had a muffled conversation with another person. When she came back on the line, her voice was clearer. "Tell me about the apartment. You said it was on the top floor?"

"Yes. Fifth floor."

"Those are one-bedroom units. A single girl wouldn't get that housing assignment unless she has a child."

"There was no child. Just three women. I'm guessing it was three. Maybe there were more."

Pam groaned. When she spoke, her voice was barely more than a whisper. "My supervisor can be persuaded sometimes."

Amanda was going to ask what she meant, but then it hit her.

Pam sounded bitter. "They should put me in charge. I wouldn't trade a top-floor apartment for a blow job."

Amanda gave a shocked laugh—as if such a thing was possible. "Well, thank you, Pam. I know you've got work to do."

"Let me know if you get the unit number. Maybe I can track it back from there. Might take me a week or two, but I'll do it for you."

"Thank you," Amanda repeated. She hung up the phone. Her hand stayed on the receiver. Her mind had been working on other things while she was talking to Pam Canale. It was like looking for your keys. The minute you stopped trying to find them, you remembered where you'd left them.

But there was only one way to be certain.

Amanda put another dime in the slot. She dialed a familiar number. Duke Wagner was never one to let a phone ring more than twice. He picked up almost immediately.

"Hey, Daddy," Amanda managed, but then she didn't know what else to say.

Duke sounded alarmed. "Are you all right? Did something happen?"

"No, no," she told him, wondering why she had called her father in the first place. This was sheer lunacy.

"Mandy? What's going on? Are you at the hospital?"

Amanda rarely heard her father panicked. Nor had she ever considered the fact that he might be worried about the job she was doing, especially since he was no longer there to protect her.

"Mandy?" She heard a chair slide across the kitchen floor. "Talk to me."

She swallowed back the uneasy realization that for just a moment, she had enjoyed scaring her father. "I'm fine, Daddy. I just had a question about—" She didn't know what to call it. "About politics."

He sounded relieved and slightly irritated. "This couldn't wait until tonight?"

"No." She looked out at the street. Cars were backing up at the light. Businessmen were going to work. Women were taking their children to school. "We had a new sergeant last week. One of Reggie's boys."

Duke made a sharp comment about this, as if his feelings weren't already known.

"He got transferred after just one day. Hoyt Woody was moved into his position."

"Hoyt's a good man."

"Well." Amanda didn't finish her thought. She found the man unctuous and off-putting, but that was not the point of this conversation. "Anyway, after a few days, Hoyt got transferred back out, and now the old sergeant, Reggie's boy, got moved back in."

"And?"

"Well," she repeated. "Doesn't that strike you as odd?"

"Not particularly." She heard him light a cigarette. "It's how the system works. You get one guy in to do one thing, then move in another to do something else."

"I'm not sure I follow."

"You gotta star pitcher, right?" Duke always favored baseball metaphors. "Only he can't swing a bat. You got it?"

"Yes."

"So you send in a pinch hitter."

"Oh." She nodded, understanding.

Duke still didn't think she got it. "There's something going on in your squad. Reggie's boy wouldn't follow orders, so they sent in Hoyt to take care of business." He laughed. "Typical. Send in a white man when you need the job done right."

Amanda held the phone away from her mouth so he wouldn't hear her sigh. "Thanks, Daddy. I should get back to work."

Duke wouldn't let her off that easy. "You're not getting mixed up in something you shouldn't?"

"No, Daddy." She tried to think of something else to say. "Be sure to put the chicken back in the refrigerator around ten. It'll spoil if you leave it out all day."

"I heard you when you told me the first six times," he snapped. Instead of hanging up, he said, "Be careful, Mandy."

She rarely heard such compassion in his voice. Unaccountably, tears came into her eyes. Butch Bonnie was right about one thing. It was close to that time of month for Amanda. She was turning into a hormonal mess. "I'll see you tonight."

She heard a click as Duke hung up the phone.

Amanda returned the receiver to the cradle. Back in her car, she took a handkerchief out of her purse and wiped her hand. Then she patted dry her face. The sun was unrelenting. She felt as if she was melting.

A honking sound ripped through the quiet of her car. Evelyn Mitchell's Ford Falcon had stopped for a yellow light. A delivery truck sped around her. The man stuck his hand out in an obscene gesture.

"For goodness sakes," Amanda mumbled, turning the key in the ignition. She pulled out onto the road and followed Evelyn three blocks down Ponce de Leon to the Union Mission. Evelyn took a slow, wide turn into the parking lot so she could back into an empty space. Amanda swung her Plymouth around and was getting out of the car by the time Evelyn turned off the engine.

Amanda said, "You're going to get yourself killed driving that slowly."

"You mean driving the speed limit? That truck driver—"

"Almost killed you," Amanda quipped. "I'm going to take you out to the stadium this weekend and give you a proper lesson."

"Oh." Evelyn seemed pleased. "Let's make a day of it. We can go to lunch and do some shopping."

Amanda was startled by her eagerness. She changed the subject. "Hodge is back at my station."

"I thought it was strange that he wasn't at Model City this morning." Evelyn closed her car door. "Why did they send him back?"

Amanda debated whether or not to reveal that she'd called her father. She decided against it. "It's possible the brass transferred in Hoyt Woody to do their dirty work."

"Why would they send in a white man? Wouldn't one of Reggie's boys be better for this sort of thing? Keep it in the family, as it were?"

She had raised a good point, but then, Evelyn didn't suffer from Duke's color blindness. Hoyt Woody would do as he was told in hopes of ingratiating himself with the brass. Luther Hodge might not be as malleable.

Amanda said, "I imagine Woody was sent in for the same reason Hodge sent two women out to talk to Jane. We're expendable. No one really listens to us."

"That's true enough." Evelyn shrugged because there was nothing they could do about it. "So, Hodge was replaced for a few days by someone who would do their dirty work, then he was slotted back in."

"Exactly." Amanda said, "Your friend at the Five said she called security on Jane Delray when she tried to cash Lucy's vouchers. Security is run out of the Five Points precinct. Whoever hauled Jane out of the building would've written her up on an incident card." The cards were part of a larger system used to track petty criminals who weren't yet worth arresting. "The cards are fed into a daily report that goes up the chain of command. Someone high up would know that Jane was trying to use Lucy's name."

Evelyn came to the same conclusion as Amanda had. "We were sent to Techwood to scare Jane into silence."

"We did a great job, didn't we?"

Evelyn put her hand to her temple. "I need a drink. This is giving me a migraine."

"Well, this should make your head hurt even more." Amanda told her about the phone call with Pam Canale, the dead end she'd hit. Then she relayed the cryptic conversation she'd had with Sergeant Hodge.

"How strange," was all Evelyn could manage. "Why won't Hodge answer our questions?"

"I think he wants us to keep working this case, but he can't appear to be encouraging us."

"I think you're right." Evelyn said, "Maybe Kitty didn't get that top-floor apartment with sexual favors. Maybe her uncle or daddy pulled some strings."

"If Kitty is the black sheep of the Treadwell family, I can certainly see Andrew Treadwell trying to keep her from making trouble. He sets her up in an apartment with her own kind. He gets her on the welfare rolls. He makes sure she's got just enough money to stay out of his hair."

"There's no way we can talk to Andrew Treadwell. We wouldn't make it as far as the lobby."

Amanda didn't bother to agree with the obvious.

Evelyn said, "I talked to my gal in undercover. It's just what I thought: it'd be easier to find a man who doesn't like choking whores."

"That's depressing."

"It is if you're a whore." Evelyn added, "I told her to ask around if anybody likes painting fingernails."

"Smart thinking."

"We'll see if it pans out. I told her to call me at home. I'd hate for any of this to go out on the radio."

"Did you find out whether or not Juice was in jail when Jane was murdered?"

"He was at Grady getting fitted with a resisting-arrest turban."

Amanda had heard the terminology before. There were a lot of prisoners who woke up in the Grady ER with no recollection of how they'd gotten there. "That's hardly an alibi. He could walk in and out of the hospital without anyone noticing.”

“You’re right,” Evelyn agreed.

Amanda blinked at the sweltering sun. “We could stand out here all day talking ourselves into circles.”

“Right again. Let’s get this part over with.” Evelyn indicated the flat, one-story building in front of them. The Union Mission had been a butcher’s shop at one time.

Amanda said, “Acapulco. Where did you get that?”

“I saw a spread in Life magazine. Johnny Weissmuller has a place there. It was gorgeous.”

“You and your magazines.”

Evelyn grinned, then turned serious as she looked up at the building. “How are we going to handle this? As far as anyone knows, Lucy Bennett committed suicide.”

“I think that’s the story we should stick to, don’t you?”

“I don’t think we have a choice.”

Amanda was used to not having a lot of choices, but it had never grated the way it did lately. She walked toward the front entrance. She could hear funk music playing on a radio. There were metal bars across the glass storefront. Rows of empty beds filled the front space, at least twenty deep and four across. The girls weren’t allowed to stay here during the day. Ostensibly, they were supposed to be out looking for jobs. The front door was propped open and the smell of the building airing out was as unpleasant as anything Amanda had smelled in the last week.

“Help you?” a man called over the music. He was dressed like a hippie, wearing sunglasses even though he was indoors. His sandy blond mustache was long and droopy. A brown fedora was pulled low on his head. He was extremely tall and lanky. His walk was more of an amble.

Evelyn mumbled, “He looks like Spike, Snoopy’s brother.”

Amanda didn’t share that she’d been thinking the same thing. She called to the man, “We’re looking for a Mr. Trask?”

He shook his head as he walked over. “No Trask here, ladies. I’m Trey Callahan.”

“Trey,” Evelyn and Amanda said in unison. At least Bennett had been close. There was no telling what he thought Amanda and Evelyn were called. If he gave it any thought at all.

“So,” Callahan flashed a laconic smile, tucking his hands into his pockets. “I’m guessing one of the girls is in trouble, in which case, I probably can’t help you. I’m neutral, like Switzerland. You dig?”

“Yes,” Evelyn said. Like Amanda, she had to look up at the man. He was at least six feet tall. “Maybe this will change your mind: We’re here about Lucy Bennett.”

His easygoing demeanor dropped. “You’re right. I’ll do anything I can to help. God rest her troubled soul.”

Amanda said, “We were hoping you could tell us about her. Give us an idea of who she was, with whom she associated?”

“Let’s go to my office.” He stood to the side, indicating they should go first. Despite his hippie appearance, someone had managed to teach him manners.

Amanda followed Evelyn into Callahan's office. The space was small but cheerful. The walls were painted a bright orange. Posters from various funk bands were pinned around the room. She catalogued the items on his desk: a framed photograph of a young woman holding a Doberman puppy. A rusted Slinky. A thick stack of typewriter paper held together by a rubber band. There was a sweet odor in the air. Amanda glanced at the ashtray, which looked recently emptied.

Callahan turned off the transistor radio on his desk. He indicated a set of chairs and waited for Evelyn and Amanda to sit before dragging his own chair out from behind the desk and sitting adjacent to them. It was a tactful move, Amanda realized. He'd managed to put them all on the same level.

Evelyn took a spiral-bound notebook out of her purse. She was very businesslike. "Mr. Callahan, you work here in what capacity?"

"Director. Janitor. Job counselor. Priest." He held out his hands, indicating the office. Amanda realized he was bigger than she first thought. His shoulders were broad. His frame filled the chair. "It doesn't pay much, but it gives me time to work on my book." He placed his palm on top of the stacked typewriter pages. "I'm doing an Atlanta version of Breakfast of Champions."

Amanda knew better than to engage him about the project. Her professors at school could wax on for hours. "Are you the only one who works here?"

"My fiancée works the night shift. She's finishing her nursing degree at Georgia Baptist." He pointed to the framed photo of the woman and the dog, flashing a used-car salesman's smile. "Trust me, ladies, we're all aboveboard here."

Evelyn wrote this down, though it was hardly germane. "Can you tell us about Lucy Bennett?"

Callahan seemed troubled. "Lucy was different from the usual clientele. She spoke properly, for one. She was tough, but there was a softness underneath." He indicated the outer room, all the empty beds. "A lot of these girls come from troubled families. They've been injured in some way. In a bad way." He paused. "You picking up what I'm putting down?"

"I feel you," Evelyn offered, as if she spoke jive every day. "You're saying Lucy wasn't like the other gals?"

"Lucy had been hurt. You could tell that about her. All of these girls have been hurt. You don't end up on the streets because you're happy." He leaned back in the chair. His legs were spread wide. Amanda could not help but be fascinated by the way a change of posture turned him from a boy into a man. Initially, she'd assumed he was her age, though looking at him now, he seemed closer to thirty.

Evelyn asked, "Did Lucy have any friends?"

"None of these girls are really friends," Callahan admitted. "Lucy chilled with her group. Their pimp was Dwayne Mathison. Goes by the name Juice. Though I'm not telling you anything you don't already know."

Amanda picked at an invisible piece of lint on her skirt. The ghetto gossip mill was more streamlined than the APD's. She guessed Callahan knew that Juice had almost assaulted them.

Evelyn asked, "When's the last time you saw Lucy?"

"Over a year ago."

"You seem to remember a lot about her."

"I had a soft spot for her." He held up his hand. "Not what you're thinking. It was nothing like that. Lucy was smart. We talked about literature. She was a voracious reader. Had these dreams about giving up the life and going to college one day. I told her about my book. Let her read some pages, even. She was down with it, you know? Got what I was doing." He shrugged. "I was trying to help her, but she wasn't ready for it."

"Did she ever have contact with her family?"

His hands gripped the arms of the chair. "That why y'all are here?"

Evelyn was better at sounding clueless than Amanda. "I don't understand."

"Lucy's brother. He send you here to tell me to keep my mouth shut?"

"We don't work for Mr. Bennett," Amanda assured the man. "He told us that he came here looking for his sister. We're simply following up."

Callahan didn't answer immediately. "Last year. Guy comes in here throwing his weight around. He was dressed real fly. Arrogant as hell." That sounded like Hank Bennett all right. "Wanted to know did I give Lucy the letter he mailed."

"Did you?"

"Of course I did." His grip loosened. "Poor thing couldn't bring herself to open it. Her hands were shaking so hard I had to put it in her purse for her. I never found out if she read it. She disappeared a week, maybe two weeks, later."

"When was this?"

"Like I said, about a year ago. August, maybe July? It was still hot as Hades, I remember that."

"You haven't seen Hank Bennett before or since?"

"I count myself lucky for that." He shifted in the chair. "Man wouldn't even shake my hand. I guess he was scared the groovy would rub off."

Evelyn asked, "I know it's been a while, but do you remember the other girls Lucy hung around with?"

"Uh ..." He pushed up his sunglasses and pressed his fingers into his eyes as he thought it out. "Jane Delray, Mary something, and ..." He dropped the glasses back down. "Kitty somebody. She wasn't here much—most nights, she was over at Techwood, but I got the feeling that wasn't a permanent situation. I never got her last name. She was a lot more like Lucy than the other girls. Not a stranger to the King's English, if you catch my drift. But they hated each other. Couldn't stand to be in the same room together."

Amanda didn't let herself look at Evelyn, but she could feel her own excitement reflecting off the other woman. "This place at Techwood—did Kitty have an apartment there?"

"I dunno. Could be. Kitty's the type of gal who's good at getting what she wants."

"Did Lucy and Kitty know each other from before?"

"I don't think so." He silently considered the question, then shook his head. "They were just the kind of girls who couldn't get along with each other. Too much alike, I expect." He leaned forward. "I'm a student of sociology, you dig? All good writers are. That's the focus of my work. The streets are my dissertation, if you will."

Evelyn seemed to understand exactly what the man was saying. "You have a theory?"

"The pimps know how to pit these types against each other. They make it clear only one can be their number one girl. Some of the gals are okay with being second string. They're used to being kicked down, you dig? But then some of them want to fight for the top. They'll do whatever it takes to be number one. Work harder. Work longer. It's survival of the fittest. They gotta be on that number one podium. Meanwhile the pimps just sit back and laugh."

Sociology be damned. Amanda had figured that out back in high school. "When's the last time you saw Kitty?"

"Maybe a year ago?" he guessed. "She wasn't spending much time here. That's around the time the church off Juniper opened up a soup kitchen. I think that was more Kitty's scene. Less competition there, anyway."

Evelyn asked, "Do you remember if Kitty stopped coming here before or after Lucy disappeared?"

"After. Maybe a couple of weeks? Not as long as a month. They might remember her at the church. Like I said, that was more Kitty's scene. She was fascinated by redemption. I gathered she had a religious upbringing. For all her faults, Kitty's a prayerful woman."

Amanda had a hard time imagining a streetwalker feeling close to the Lord. "Do you know the name of the church?"

"No idea, but it's got a big black cross painted on the front. Run by a tall brother, real clean-cut. Well spoken."

"Brother," Evelyn echoed. "You mean he's Negro?"

Callahan chuckled. "No, sister. I mean he's a brother in Christ. At the end of the day, we all shuffle off the same mortal coils."

"Hamlet," Amanda said. She'd studied Shakespeare two quarters ago.

Callahan lifted up his sunglasses and winked at her. His eyes were bloodshot. The lashes reminded her of the teeth on a Venus flytrap. "'Be all my sins remembered,' fair Ophelia."

Amanda felt a flash of embarrassment.

Thankfully, Evelyn took over. "This man at the church. Do you know his name?"

"No idea. Kind of an asshole, if you ask me. Wants to argue about books and shit but you can tell he's never read one in his life." Callahan dropped his sunglasses back into place. "You know, I really thought Lucy would tell me goodbye before she left. Like I said, we had a thing. A platonic thing. Maybe she was too ashamed. These girls don't usually stay put for long. Their pimp gets tired of them not earning enough. He trades them off to the next guy down the line. Sometimes, they just move on. A few go back home, if their families will have them. The rest end up down at the Gradys."

"Gradys," Amanda repeated. It was strange to hear this word coming out of a white man's mouth. Only the blacks called Grady Hospital the Gradys. The name dated back to when the hospital wards were segregated. Amanda asked, "What about Jane Delray? Have you ever heard of her?"

Callahan gave a surprised laugh. "That sister is crazy mean. She'd cut you just as soon as look at you."

"Why do you say that?"

"Jane was always fighting with the girls. Always stealing their stuff. I finally had to ban her from the mission, and I don't like to do that to any of them. This is their last resort. They can't come here, there's nowhere else for them to go."

"They can't go to the soup kitchen?"

"Not if they're messed up. Brother won't let them through the door." Callahan shrugged. "It's not a bad policy. When these girls come in high, they're more prone to make trouble. But I can't just lock the door and leave them on the street."

"They can't get assistance from the Housing Authority?"

"Not if they've got prostitution on their record. The HA screens them out. They don't want girls setting up their businesses on the public dime."

Amanda tried to process the information. She was glad Evelyn was writing this down. "Is there anything else you can remember about Lucy?"

"Just that she was a good girl. I know it's hard for you to believe, especially working for the po-lice. But all of them started out good. They made a bad choice somewhere along the line, and then they made another one, and pretty soon their lives were nothing but bad choices. Lucy especially. She didn't deserve to go out like that." His hands gripped the chair again. His voice took on a hard edge. "I don't like to break on a brother, but I hope they fry him for this."

Amanda asked, "What do you mean?"

"It's already out." Callahan indicated the radio. "Heard it on the radio before you ladies walked in. Juice was arrested for killing Lucy Bennett. He gave a full confession." The phone on his desk started ringing. "Excuse me," he apologized, leaning over to lift the receiver.

Amanda didn't trust herself to look at Evelyn.

Callahan used his hand to cover the mouthpiece on the phone. "I'm sorry, ladies. This is one of our donors calling. Was there anything else you needed from me?"

"No." Evelyn stood up. Amanda followed suit. "Thank you for your time."

The sun was so bright when they walked out of the building that Amanda's eyes teared up. She shaded herself with her hand as they walked into the parking lot.

"Well." Evelyn slipped on her Foster Grants. "Arrested."

"Arrested," Amanda echoed. "And confessed."

They both stood by the cars, stunned silent.

Finally, Amanda said, "What do you make of that?"

"I'm flummoxed," Evelyn admitted. "I suppose Juice could've done it. Might've done it." She contradicted herself. "Then again, it's not that hard to get a confession, especially for Butch and Landry."

Amanda nodded. At least once a week, Butch and Landry showed up for roll call with cuts and bruises on their knuckles. "You said it yourself: Juice could've slipped out of the hospital, murdered Jane, and climbed back in bed with no one realizing he was gone." Amanda leaned against her car, then thought better of it when the heat singed through her skirt. "Then again, Trey Callahan just confirmed Juice was pimp to both Lucy Bennett and Jane Delray. He would know the difference between the two girls. Why would he confess to killing one when it was the other?"

"I doubt very seriously Rick Landry is letting him get his story out." She added, "A black man kills a white woman? That's a hummy if there ever was one."

She was right. The case would hum right through City Hall. Juice would be in prison before the year was out—if he lived that long.

Both women were silent again. Amanda couldn't recall a time she'd been more shocked.

And then Evelyn topped it. "Do you think we could speak to him?"

"Speak to whom?"

"Juice."

The question was as crazy as it was dangerous. "Rick Landry would string us up alive. I didn't want to tell you, but he was very angry this morning. He complained to Hodge right in front of me about us interfering in his case."

"What did Hodge say?"

"Nothing, really. The man speaks in riddles. Every question I asked, he just said, 'That's a good question.' It was maddening."

"That's his way of telling you to ignore Rick and to keep moving forward." Evelyn held up her hands to stop Amanda's protest. "Think about it: If Hodge wanted you to stop looking into this, he would've ordered you to stop. He could've assigned you to crossing duty. He could've benched you and made you file all day. Instead, he told you to skip roll call and meet up with me." She smiled appreciatively. "It's very clever, really. He doesn't tell you what to do, but he makes you want to do it."

"It's annoying, is what it is. Why can't he just speak directly? What's wrong with that?"

"He was already transferred to Model City for four days. I imagine he's making sure he doesn't get sent back."

"Meanwhile, it's my head on the chopping block."

Evelyn seemed to be gauging her own words. "He's probably afraid of you, Amanda. You must know that a lot of people are."

Amanda could've been knocked down with a feather. "Whatever for?"

"Your father."

"That's just silly. Even if my father cared about such things, I'm not a tattletale."

"They don't know that." Evelyn's voice was gentle. "Sweetheart, it's just a matter of time before your father's back in uniform. He still has a lot of powerful friends. There's bound to be payback. Do you really think people shouldn't be afraid?"

Amanda didn't want to admit that she was right about Duke, even while she was wrong about the rest. "I don't know why we're even having this conversation. Juice has been arrested for murder. The case is closed. We'd turn the whole department against us if we made trouble."

"You're right." Evelyn looked out into the street, the cars rushing by. "We're probably fools to care. Juice was going to rape us. Jane hated us on sight. Lucy Bennett was a junkie and a prostitute whose own brother couldn't stand to be in the same room with her." She nodded back at the mission. "No matter how well read Snoopy's brother says she was." She took off her sunglasses. "What was with that Ophelia line, anyway?"

"It's from Hamlet."

"I'm aware of that." Evelyn sounded testy. "I do read more than magazines, you know."

Amanda considered it wiser to hold her tongue.

Evelyn put her sunglasses back on. "Ophelia was a tragic figure. She had an abortion and killed herself by falling from a tree."

"Where do you get that she had an abortion?"

"She took rue. It's an herb women used to bring about miscarriages. Shakespeare had her passing out flowers and she—" Evelyn shook her head. "Never mind. The point is, are you going to go to the jail or not?"

"Me?" Amanda's mind couldn't handle these sudden shifts. "Alone?"

"I told Cindy I'd go to the Five and check the license box for Lucy's ID."

"That's very convenient."

"Bubba Keller is one of your father's poker buddies, right?"

Amanda wondered if she was making an allusion to the Klan. "What does that have to do with anything?"

"Keller runs the jail."

"And?"

"And, if you go to the jail and ask to speak with Juice, it's no big deal. If you go to the jail with me and ask to speak to Juice, it gets back to your father."

Amanda didn't know what to say. She felt caught out, as if Evelyn was suddenly privy to all the lies Amanda had told Duke over the last week.

"It's all right," Evelyn said. "We all have to answer to someone."

Evelyn didn't seem to have to answer to anybody. Amanda said, "Let me get this straight: you want me to waltz into the jail and ask to speak to a prisoner who's just been arrested for murder?"

Evelyn shrugged. "Why not?"

Present Day

SUZANNA FORD

Zanna woke with a start. She couldn't move. She couldn't see. Her throat ached. She could barely swallow. She turned her head back and forth. A pillow cupped her head. She was lying down. She was in bed.

She tried to say "help," but her lips would not move. The word got trapped in her mouth. She tried again.

"Help ..."

She coughed. Her throat was bone dry. Her eyes throbbed in her head. Every movement sent pain shooting through her body. She was blindfolded. She didn't know where she was. All she remembered was the man.

The man.

His weight shifted on the bed as he stood up. They weren't in the hotel room anymore. The low rumble of traffic weaving through downtown had been replaced by two noises. The first one was a hum, like the white-noise machine they bought her grandmother for Christmas one year. It kept up a steady hushing sound.

Hush, little baby ... don't say a word ...

The other noise was harder to place. It was so familiar, but every time she thought she had it pinned down, it would change. A whistling sound. Not like a train. Like air sucking through a tunnel. An underwater tunnel. A pneumatic tube.

There was no regularity to it. It only served to make her feel more out of body. More out of place. She didn't even know if she was still in Atlanta. Or Georgia. Or America. She had no idea how long she'd been out. She had no sense of time or place. She knew nothing but the fear of anticipation.

The man started mumbling again. There was the sound of a faucet turning on. The splash of water in a metal bowl.

Zanna's teeth started chattering. She wanted meth. She needed meth. Her body was starting to convulse. She was going to lose it. She was going to start screaming. Maybe she should scream. Maybe she should shout so loud that he had to kill her, because she had no doubt that's what this man was going to do. It was only a matter of the hell he would put her through first.

Ted Bundy. John Wayne Gacy. Jeffrey Dahmer. The Night Stalker. The Green River Killer.

Zanna had read every book Ann Rule had ever written, and when there wasn't a book, there was a TV movie or an Internet site or a Dateline or a 20/20 or a 48

Hours, and she remembered every lurid detail about every sadistic freak who had ever kidnapped a woman for his own demonic pleasure.

And this man was a demon. There was no arguing with that. Zanna's parents had given up on church when she was a kid, but she had lived in Roswell long enough to recognize a stray verse, the cadence of scripture. The man mumbled prayers and he beseeched God for His forgiveness, but Zanna knew that no one was listening except the Devil himself.

The water turned off. Two footsteps, and he was back on the bed. She felt the weight of him as he sat down beside her. More water dripping. Loud drops into the bowl.

Suzanna flinched as the warm, wet rag washed along her skin.

Present Day

TUESDAY

Sara's knees protested as she worked her way around the living room, dipping a washcloth into the bowl of vinegar and hot water, then washing down the baseboards section by maddening section.

Some women sat around watching TV when they were upset. Others went shopping or gorged themselves on chocolate. It was Sara's lot in life that she cleaned. She blamed her mother. Cathy Linton's response to any ailment was generally hard labor.

"Ugh." Sara sat back on her heels. She wasn't used to cleaning her own apartment. She was dripping sweat despite the low temperature on her thermostat. The climate was not being appreciated by anyone. Her greyhounds were huddled on the couch as if they were in the middle of an arctic winter.

Technically, Sara was supposed to be at work right now, but there was an unspoken rule in the ER that any person could leave if three really horrendous things happened to them during one shift. Today, Sara had been kicked in the leg by a homeless man, narrowly avoided being punched in the face by the mother of a boy who was so high he'd defecated on himself, and had her hand vomited on by one of the new interns. All before lunchtime.

If Sara's supervisor hadn't told her to leave, she was fairly certain she would've quit. Which was probably why Grady had the rule in the first place.

She finished the last section of baseboard and stood up. Her knees were wobbly from being bent for so long. Sara stretched out her hamstrings before she walked toward the kitchen with the rag and bowl. She dumped the vinegar solution down the drain, washed her hands, then picked up a dry rag and a can of Pledge to begin the next phase.

Sara looked at the clock on the microwave. Will still had not called. She imagined he was sitting on a toilet at Hartsfield-Jackson Airport waiting for a business traveler to tap his foot under the stall. Which meant there was plenty of time for him to dial her phone number. Maybe he was sending a message. Maybe he was trying to tell her that what they had was over.

Or maybe Sara was reading too much into his silence. She had never been good at playing games in relationships. She preferred to be direct. Which was at the very root of their problems.

What she desperately needed was a second opinion. Cathy Linton was at home, but Sara had a feeling her mother's reaction would be similar to the one she had the time Sara was ill from eating an entire package of Oreos. Sure, she'd held back Sara's hair and patted her back, but not without first demanding, "What the hell did you think would happen?"

Which was exactly what Sara kept asking herself. The worst part was that she was turning into one of those annoying people who got so caught up whining about a bad situation that they forgot they were actually capable of doing something about it.

Sara cleared off the mantel for dusting. She gently held the small cherrywood box that had belonged to her grandmother. The hinge was coming apart. Sara carefully opened the lid. Two wedding rings rested on the satin pillow.

Her husband had been a cop, which was basically where the similarity between Jeffrey and Will ended. Or maybe not. They were both funny. They had the same strong, moral character that Sara had always been attracted to. They were both drawn to duty. They were drawn to Sara.

That was one thing about Jeffrey that was completely different from Will. He had made no equivocations about wanting Sara. It was clear from the beginning that he was going to have her. He'd strayed once, but Jeffrey had dragged himself through broken glass to win her back. Not that Sara expected the same kind of dramatic gestures from Will, but she needed a stronger sign of commitment than just showing up in her bed every night.

Sara had fallen in love with her husband because of his beautiful handwriting. She'd seen his notes written in the margin of a book. The script was soft and flowing, unexpected for someone whose work required him to carry a gun and occasionally use his fists. Sara had never seen Will's handwriting, except for his signature, which was little more than a scrawl. He left her Post-it notes with smiley faces on them. A few times, he'd sent her a text with the same. Sara knew Will read the occasional book, but mostly stuck with audio recordings. As with many things, his dyslexia wasn't something they talked about.

Could she love this man? Could she see herself being part of his life—or, at least the part of his life that he allowed her to see?

Sara wasn't sure.

She closed the box and returned it to its proper place on the mantel.

Maybe Will didn't want her. Maybe he was just having fun. He still kept his wedding ring in the front pocket of his pants. Sara had been pleased when he'd shown up with his finger bare, but she wasn't stupid. Neither was Will, which was why it was puzzling that he kept the ring in an area where her hands usually ended up.

Sara hadn't realized she was falling in love with Jeffrey when she'd opened that book and seen his writing. It was only later when she looked back that she realized what was happening. There were memories of Will that gave her heart that familiar tug. Watching him wash dishes at her mother's kitchen sink. The way he listened so intently when she talked about her family. The look on his face the first time he'd really made love to her.

Sara leaned her head against the mantel. Given enough idleness and time, she could talk herself into either loving or hating the man. Which was why she wished he would just bite the bullet and call her.

The phone rang. Sara jumped. She felt her heart thumping as she walked toward the phone, which was equal parts stupid and foolish. She'd gone to medical school, for the love of God. She shouldn't be so easily swayed by coincidence. “Hello?”

“How is my favorite student?” Pete Hanson asked. He was one of the top ME’s in the state. Sara had taken several courses from him when she was medical examiner for Grant County. “I hear you’re playing hooky from school.”

“Mental health day,” she admitted, trying to hide her disappointment that it wasn’t Will on the other end of the line. Then, because Pete never just called her out of the blue, she asked, “Is something wrong?”

“I have some news, my dear. It’s fairly private, so I’d prefer to deliver it in person.”

Sara glanced around the apartment, which was upside down. Pillows on the floor. Rugs rolled up. Dog toys scattered around. Enough fur to build a new greyhound. “Are you at City Hall East?”

“As always.”

“I’m on my way.”

Sara ended the call and tossed the receiver onto the couch. She checked her reflection in the mirror. Her hair was frizzed with sweat. Her skin was blotchy. She was wearing jeans that were torn at the knees and a Lady Rebels T-shirt that had looked great back when she was in high school. Will worked in the same building as Pete, but he was on the Southside all day, so there was no chance of running into him. Sara grabbed her keys and left the apartment. She took the steps down to the lobby, and didn’t stop until she saw her car.

There was another note tucked under the windshield wiper. Angie Trent had changed things up. Along with the familiar “Whore,” the woman had kissed the white notebook paper with her heavily lipsticked mouth.

Sara folded the note in two as she got into her car. She rolled down the window and tossed the paper into the trashcan by the automatic gate. Sara supposed Angie parked on the street and walked under the gate to put these notes on her car. Up until a few years ago, Angie had been a cop. Apparently, she had been one of the best undercover agents that the Vice Squad had ever had. Like many former police officers, she didn’t worry about petty crimes such as trespassing and terroristic threats.

A horn beeped behind her. Sara hadn’t noticed the gate go up. She waved her hand in apology, pulling out into the street. If thinking about Will was a futile endeavor, thinking about his wife was a lesson in self-hatred. There was a reason Angie had so easily passed for a high-class call girl. She was tall and curvy and had that secret pheromone that let every interested man—or woman, if the stories were true—know that she was available. Which was why Will was going to be wearing a condom until his final blood test came back.

That was, if they lasted that long.

City Hall East was less than a mile from Sara’s apartment. Housed in the old Sears department store building on Ponce de Leon Avenue, the space was as sprawling as it was dilapidated. The metal windows and cracked brickwork had been pristine at one time, but the city hadn’t the money to maintain such a vast structure. It was one of the largest buildings by volume in the southeastern United States, which only partially explained why half the complex stood vacant.

Will’s office was on one of the upper floors that had been taken over by the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. The fact that Sara had never seen his office was one of the many things she tried to push from her mind as she navigated the large loop down to the underground parking lot.

Despite the mild climate, the parking garage was not as cool as it should've been, considering it was belowground. The morgue was even more subterranean, but like the garage, was mildly warmer than expected. There must've been something wrong with the air circulation, or maybe the building was so old that it was doing its best to force the inhabitants to let it go.

Sara took the cracked concrete stairs down to the basement. She could smell the familiar odors of the morgue, the caustic products that were used to clean the floors and the chemicals used to disinfect the bodies. Back in Grant County, Sara had taken the part-time job of medical examiner to help buy out her retiring partner at the children's clinic. The work in the morgue was sometimes tedious, but generally a lot more fascinating than the tummy aches and sniffles she treated at the clinic. That Grady Hospital was only marginally more challenging was yet another thought she pushed from her mind.

Pete Hanson's office was adjacent to the morgue. Sara could see him through the open door. He was bent over his desk, which was piled high with papers. His filing system wasn't one Sara would've chosen, but many times, she'd seen Pete pluck exactly what he needed from a random pile.

She knocked on the door as she walked into the office. Her hand stopped midair. He'd lost weight recently. Too much weight.

"Sara." He smiled at her, showing yellow teeth. Pete was an aging hippie who refused to give up his long braided hair, even though there was considerably less of it. He favored loud Hawaiian shirts and liked to listen to the Grateful Dead while he performed procedures. As medical examiners went, he was fairly typical, which was to say the bottled specimen of an eighteen-year-old victim's heart that he kept on a shelf above his desk was only in aid of his favorite joke.

She set it up for him. "How are you doing, Pete?"

Instead of telling her that he had the heart of an eighteen-year-old, Pete frowned. "Thanks for coming by, Sara." He indicated an empty chair. Pete had obviously prepared for her. The papers and charts that were normally piled on the chair had been placed on the floor.

Sara sat down. "What's wrong?"

He turned back to his computer and tapped the space bar on his keyboard. A digital radiograph was on the screen. The frontal chest X-ray showed a large white mass in the middle portion of the left lung. Sara looked at the file name at the top. Peter Wayne Hanson.

"SCLC," he told her. Small-cell lung cancer, the deadliest kind.

Sara felt like she'd been punched in the gut. "The new protocol—"

"Doesn't work for me." He clicked the file closed. "It's already metastasized to my brain and liver."

Sara delivered bad news to her patients on a daily basis. She seldom found herself on the other end. "Oh, Pete, I'm so sorry."

"Well, it's not the best way to go, but it beats slipping in the tub." He sat back in his chair. She saw it clearly now—the gauntness in his cheeks, the sallow look in his eyes. He indicated the jar on the shelf. "So much for my eighteen-year-old heart."

Sara laughed at the inappropriate humor. Pete was a great doctor, but his best trait was his generosity. He was the most patient and giving teacher Sara had ever had. He was delighted when a student managed to pick up on a detail he'd missed—a rare trait among physicians.

He said, "At the very least, it's given me a wonderful excuse to take up smoking again." He mimicked puffing a cigarette. "Unfiltered Camels. My second wife hated them. You've met Deena, right?"

"I only know her by reputation." Dr. Coolidge ran the forensics lab at GBI headquarters. "Do you have any plans?"

"You mean a bucket list?" He shook his head. "I've seen the world—at least the parts of it I want to see. I'd rather make myself as useful as I can with what little time I have left. Maybe plant some trees at my farm that my great-grandchildren will climb on. Spend time with my friends. I hope that includes you."

Sara willed herself not to tear up. She looked down at the cracked tile floor. There was so much asbestos in the building, she wouldn't be surprised to learn that Pete's cancer was down to more than cigarettes. She glanced at the pile of papers by the chair. A manila envelope was on top of the pile, faded red tape sealing it closed. The evidence was old. Deep creases maintained the accordion fold of the envelope. The areas that weren't yellowed with age were smeared black.

Pete followed her gaze. "Old case."

Sara noted the date, which was over thirty years ago. "Very old case."

"We were lucky they found it in evidence, though I'm not sure if we'll need it after all." He picked up the envelope and put it on his desk. The black dust transferred to his fingers. "The city used to purge closed cases every five years. We did some crazy stuff back then."

Sara could tell the case meant something to him. She knew the feeling. There were still victims she'd worked on back in Grant County that would haunt her memories until the day she died.

Pete asked, "How are things at Grady?"

"Oh, you know." Sara didn't know what to say. She was called "bitch" so often that she turned her head whenever anyone yelled the word. "Swimming pools and movie stars."

"In nearly fifty years, I've not once had a patient talk back or file a complaint against me." He raised an eyebrow. "You know they'll need someone to take my place when I'm gone."

Sara laughed, then saw that he wasn't joking.

"Just a thought," he told her. "But this brings me to a favor I need to ask."

"What can I do?"

"I've got a case that just came in. It's very important. It has to hold up."

"Does it have anything to do with that?" She indicated the dirty envelope on his desk.

"Yes," he admitted. "I can do all the heavy lifting, but I need to make sure that six months, a year from now, someone's around to testify."

"You've got dozens of people working under you."

"Just four at the moment," he corrected. "Unfortunately, none of them possess the length and breadth of your experience."

"I don't—"

"You're still credentialed. I checked with the state." He leaned forward. "I'm not a duplicitous man, Sara. You know that about me. So you'll understand that I'm being brutally honest when I tell you that this is a dying man's last request. I need you to do this for me. I need you to go to court. I need you to speak directly to a jury and put this man back where he belongs."

Sara was momentarily at a loss. This was the last thing she'd been expecting. Her apartment looked as if it had been hit by a tornado. She still had Will to deal with. She was dressed more suitably for a pickup softball game than for work. Still, she knew that she didn't have a choice. "There's already a suspect?"

"Yes." He shuffled the papers around and found a yellow file folder.

Sara scanned the preliminary report. There wasn't much. A dead Jane Doe had been found outside a Dumpster in a fairly upscale part of town. She'd been beaten to death. Her wallet was absent cash. The bruising around her wrists and ankles indicated that she'd been tied up, possibly kidnapped.

Sara looked up at Pete. She had an awful, sinking feeling. "The missing Georgia Tech student?"

"We don't have positive ID yet, but I'm afraid so."

"Death penalty case?" Pete nodded. "Is the body here?"

"They brought her in half an hour ago." Pete looked up at the doorway. "Hello, Mandy."

"Pete." Amanda Wagner's arm was in a sling. She looked worse for the wear, though she still kept up the formalities. "Dr. Linton."

"Dr. Wagner," Sara returned. She couldn't help but look over the woman's shoulder for Will.

Amanda asked Pete, "Did Vanessa come by?"

"First thing this morning." He explained to Sara, "The fourth Mrs. Hanson."

Amanda said, "Dr. Linton, I hope we can avail ourselves of your expertise?"

Sara felt a bit managed. She asked the obvious question. "Is this Will's case?"

"No. Agent Trent is absolutely not assigned to this case. Which doesn't explain why I've spent the last three hours of my day walking up and down every hallway in a twelve-story office building talking to people who have better things to do than watch us chase our tails." She paused for a breath. "Pete, when did we get so old?"

"Speak for yourself. I always told you I was going to die young."

She laughed, but there was a sad edge to the sound.

"I can still remember the first time you came into my morgue."

"Please, let's not get maudlin. Try to go out with some dignity."

He grinned like a cat. There was a moment between them, and Sara wondered if Amanda Wagner had fallen somewhere along the timeline of the many Mrs. Hansons.

The moment passed quickly. Pete stood from his desk. He reached out, bracing himself against the chair. Sara jumped up to help him, but he gently pushed her away. "Not to that point yet, my dear." He told Amanda, "You can use my office. We'll go ahead and get started."

Pete indicated that Sara should leave ahead of him. She pushed open the doors to the morgue, resisting the urge to hold them for Pete. He seemed more diminished in the large tiled room. The office had served as a buffer against his wasted appearance. In the bright lights of the autopsy theater, there was no hiding the obvious.

"A bit cool in here," Pete mumbled, taking his white lab coat off the hook. He went to the cabinet and handed Sara one of his spares. His name was stitched over the pocket. Sara could've wrapped the coat around her body twice. But then, so could Pete.

"Our victim." He indicated a draped body in the center of the room. Blood had permeated the sheet, which was unusual. Circulation stopped when the heart stopped beating. Blood congealed. Sara couldn't help but feel some guilty excitement. She relished a difficult case. Working at Grady, dealing with the same types of ailments and injuries over and over again, could become a bit mind-numbing.

Pete said, "We've already photographed and X-rayed her. Sent her clothes to the lab. Do you know we used to just cut them off and throw them in a bag? And rape cases." He laughed. "My God, the science was flawed from the beginning. There was no taking the victim's word for it. If we didn't find semen in the suspected attacker's underwear, then we couldn't legally sign off on a charge of rape."

Sara didn't know what to say. She couldn't imagine how awful things used to be. Thankfully, she didn't have to.

Pete looped his braid on top of his head and pulled on an Atlanta Braves baseball hat. He was in his element inside the morgue, visibly more animated. "I remember the first time I talked to an odontologist about bite marks. I was certain we were looking at the future of crime solving. Hair fibers. Carpet fibers." He chuckled. "If I have one regret about my impending doom, it's that I won't live to see the day when we've got everyone's DNA on an iPad, and all we have to do is scan some blood or a piece of tissue and up pops a current location for our bad guy. It'll end crime as we know it."

Sara didn't want to talk about Pete's impending doom. She busied herself with her hair, tightening the band, tucking it into a surgeon's cap so she wouldn't contaminate anything. "How long have you known Amanda?"

"Since dinosaurs walked among us," he joked. Then, in a more serious tone, he said, "I met her when she started working with Evelyn. They were both a couple of pistols."

The description struck Sara as odd, as if Amanda and Evelyn had run around Atlanta like two Calamity Janes. "What was she like?"

"She was interesting," Pete said, which was one of his highest compliments. He looked at Sara's reflection in the mirror over the sink as he washed his hands. "I know it wasn't great when you came up in medical school—what were there, a handful of women?"

"If that," Sara answered. "But this last class was over sixty percent." She didn't mention that the ones who weren't taking time off to have children were mostly funneling themselves into pediatrics or gynecology, the same as they had when Sara was an intern. "How many women were on the force when Amanda joined?"

He squinted as he thought about it. "Less than two hundred out of over a thousand?" Pete stepped back so Sara could wash her hands. "No one thought women should be on the job. It was considered man's work. There was all kinds of grumbling about how they couldn't protect themselves, didn't have the cojones to pull the trigger. The truth was that everyone was secretly terrified they'd be better. Can't blame 'em." Pete winked at her. "The last time women were in charge, they outlawed alcohol."

Sara smiled back at him. "I think we should be forgiven one mistake in almost a hundred years."

"Perhaps," he allowed. "You know, you listen to my generation these days, we were all free-loving hippies, but the truth is there were more Amanda Wagners than there were Timothy Learys, especially in this part of the country." He gave her a twinkling smile. "Not to say it entirely passed us by. I lived in a glorious singles complex off the Chattahoochee. Riverbend. Ever hear of it?"

Sara shook her head. She was enjoying Pete's reminiscing. His cancer was obviously compelling him to put his life in perspective.

"A lot of airline pilots lived there. Stewardesses. Lawyers and doctors and nurses, oh my." His eyes lit up at the memory. "I had a nice side business selling penicillin to many of the fine Republican men and women currently running our state government."

Sara used her elbow to turn off the faucet. "Sounds like crazy times." She had come of age during the AIDS epidemic, when free love started exacting its price.

"Crazy indeed." Pete handed her some paper towels. "When was Brown v. the Board of Education?"

"The desegregation case?" Sara shrugged. Her high school history class was some time ago. "Fifty-four? Fifty-five?"

Pete said, "It was around that time that the state required white teachers to sign a pledge disavowing integration. They would lose their jobs if they refused."

Sara had never heard of the pledge, but she wasn't surprised.

"Duke, Amanda's father, was away when the pledge was circulating." Pete blew into a pair of powdered surgical gloves before putting them on. "Miriam, Amanda's mother, refused to sign the pledge. So her grandfather—a very powerful man. He was a higher-up with Southern Bell—sent her off to Milledgeville."

Sara felt her lips part in surprise. "He committed his daughter to the state mental hospital?"

"The facility was basically a warehouse back then, mostly for vets and the criminally insane. And women who wouldn't listen to their fathers." Pete shook his head. "It broke her. It broke many people."

Sara tried to do the math. "Was Amanda born yet?"

"She was around four or five, I'd guess. Duke was still in Korea, so his father-in-law was in charge. I gather no one told Duke what was really going on. The minute he was back in Georgia, he grabbed Amanda and signed his wife out of Milledgeville. Never talked to his father-in-law again." Pete handed Sara a pair of gloves. "Everything seemed fine, and then one day, Miriam went out into the back garden and hanged herself from a tree."

"That's awful." Sara pulled on the surgical gloves. No wonder Amanda was so closed down. She was worse than Will.

"Don't let it soften you toward her too much," Pete warned. "She lied to you in my office. She wanted you here for a reason."

Instead of asking what reason, Sara followed his gaze to the door. Will was there. He stared at Sara in utter shock. She had never seen him look so awful. His eyes were bloodshot. He was rumpled and unshaven. His body swayed from exhaustion. His pain was so obvious that Sara could almost feel her heart breaking.

Her instinct was to go to him, but Faith was there, then Amanda, then Leo Donnelly, and Sara knew that a public display would only make things worse. She could read it in his face. He looked absolutely stricken to find her there.

Sara glared at Pete, making sure he knew that she was furious. Amanda may have lied about this being Will's case, but Pete was the one who had lured Sara to the morgue. She snapped off the gloves as she walked toward Will. He obviously didn't want Sara to see him like this. She planned to take him into Pete's office to explain what had happened and apologize profusely, but Will's expression stopped her.

Close up, he looked even worse. Sara had to force herself not to put her hands to his face, rest his head on her shoulder. Exhaustion radiated from his body. There was so much pain in his eyes that her heart broke all over again.

She kept her voice low. "Tell me what you need me to do. I can leave. I can stay. Whatever is best for you."

His breathing was shallow. He gave her such a look of desperation that Sara had to fight to keep herself from crying.

"Tell me what to do," she begged. "What you need me to do."

His gaze settled on the gurney. The victim on the table. He mumbled, "Stay," as he walked into the room.

Sara let out a stuttered breath before she turned around. Faith couldn't look at her, but Amanda held her gaze. Sara had never understood Will's mercurial relationship with his boss, but at that moment, she ceased caring. There was not another person on the planet right now whom Sara despised more than Amanda Wagner. She was obviously playing some kind of game with Will, just as it was obvious that Will was losing.

"Let's begin," Pete suggested.

Sara stood to Pete's side, opposite Will and Faith, her arms crossed. She tried to calm her anger. Will had told her to stay. Sara could not guess the reason why, but she didn't need to add more tension to the room. A woman had been murdered. That should be the focus.

"All right, ladies and gentlemen." Pete used his foot to tap on the Dictaphone to record the procedure. He called out the usual information—time of day, persons present, and the victim's tentative identity of Ashleigh Renee Snyder. "ID has yet to be confirmed by family, though of course we'll follow with dental records, which have already been digitized and sent to the Panthersville Road lab." He asked Leo Donnelly, "Is the father en route?"

"Squad car's picking him up from the airport. Should be any minute now."

"Very good, Detective." Pete gave him a stern look. "I trust you're going to keep any wry comments or off-color jokes to yourself?"

Leo held up his hands. "I'm just here for the ID so I can turn over the case."

"Thank you."

Without preamble, Pete grabbed the top of the sheet and pulled back the drape. Faith gasped. Her hand went to her mouth. Just as quickly, she forced her arm back down to her side. Her throat worked. She didn't blink. Faith had never had the stomach for these things, but she seemed determined to hold her own.

Unusually, Sara shared her discomfort. After all these years, she'd thought herself anesthetized to the horrors of violence, but there was something gut-wrenching about the state of the woman's body. She hadn't just been killed. She'd been mutilated. Bruises blackened her torso. Tiny red edemas cracked the skin. One of her ribs had punctured through the flesh. Her intestines hung between her legs.

But that wasn't the worst of it.

Sara had never been one to believe in the concept of evil. She always thought the word was an excuse—a way to explain away mental illness or depravity. A safe word to hide behind rather than face the truth that human beings were capable of despicable acts. That not much kept us from acting on our baser urges.

Yet, "evil" was the only word that came to mind when Sara looked down at the victim. It wasn't the bruises, the punctures, even the bite marks that were shocking. It was the methodical slices along the insides of the woman's arms and legs. It was the crisscross pattern that traced up her hips and torso in an almost ruler-straight line. Her attacker had ripped the flesh the same way you would rip out a seam in a dress.

And then there was her face. Sara could not begin to understand what had been done to her face.

Pete said, "The X-rays show the hyoid bone was broken."

Sara recognized the familiar bruising around the woman's neck. "Was she thrown off a building after she was strangled?"

Pete said, "No. She was found outside a one-story building. The intestinal prolapse is likely from premortem external trauma. A blunt object, or a fist. Do these striations look like finger marks to you, perhaps from a closed fist?"

"Yes." Sara pressed her lips together. The force of the blows must have been tremendous. The killer was obviously fit, probably a large man, and undoubtedly filled with rage. For all the world had changed, there were still men out there who absolutely despised women.

"Dr. Hanson," Amanda asked, "for the benefit of the tape, what would you estimate is the time of death?"

Pete smiled at the question. "I would guess anywhere between three and five o'clock this morning."

Faith volunteered, "The witness who saw the green van was out jogging around four-thirty. He doesn't know the make or model." She still couldn't look at Sara. "We've put out an APB, but it's probably a dead end."

"Four-thirty this morning certainly works for me," Pete said. "As you all know, time of death is not an exact science."

Amanda huffed, "Just like old times."

"Dr. Linton?" Pete motioned for Sara to join him. "Why don't you take the left side and I'll take the right?"

Sara pulled on a fresh pair of gloves. Will stepped back as she made her way around the table. He was being too quiet. He wouldn't meet her questioning gaze. Sara still felt the need to do something for him, but there was an equally overwhelming pull to do right by the dead woman. Something told her that the latter would aid in the former. This was Will's case, no matter what lies Amanda had told. He obviously felt some emotional attachment. Sara had never seen anyone look so bereft.

And she understood why Pete wanted to make sure someone he trusted was able to testify. Every inch of the victim's body screamed for justice. Whoever had attacked and murdered Ashleigh Snyder had not just wanted to hurt her. He'd wanted to destroy her.

Sara felt a subtle shift in her brain as she prepared herself for the procedure. Juries had watched enough CSI to understand the basic tenets of autopsy, but it was the medical examiner's job to guide them through the science behind each finding. The chain of custody was sacrosanct. All the slide numbers, tissue samples, and trace evidence would be catalogued into the computer. The lot would be sealed with tamper-proof tape that could be opened only inside the GBI lab. Trace evidence and tissue would be profiled for DNA. The DNA would hopefully be matched to a suspect, and the suspect would be arrested based on incontrovertible evidence.

Pete asked Sara, "Shall we begin?"

There were two Mayo trays prepared with identical instruments: wooden probes, tweezers, flexible rulers, vials and slides. Pete's had a magnifying glass, which he held to his eye as he leaned over the body. Instead of starting at the top of the head, he studied the victim's hand. As with the legs and torso, the flesh along the inside of her arm, from her wrist to her armpit, was ripped open in a straight line. It continued in a U to her upper torso, then followed down to her hips.

"You haven't washed her?" Sara asked. The skin looked scrubbed. There was a faint odor of soap.

"No," Pete answered.

"She looks clean," Sara noted for the tape. "The pubic hair is shaved. No stubble on the legs." She used her thumb to press the skin around the eyes. "Eyebrows tweezed into an arch. Fake eyelashes."

Sara concentrated on the scalp. The roots were dark, the remaining strands a choppy yellow and white. "She has blonde hair extensions. They're attached close to the scalp, so they must be new." Sara used the fine-toothed comb as best she could, working around the weave to remove any particles from the hair. The white paper under the girl's head showed dandruff and pieces of asphalt. Sara set the specimens aside for processing.

Next, she examined the hairline, checking for needle punctures and other marks that didn't belong. She used an otoscope to examine the nostrils. "There's some nasal corrosion. The membrane is torn, but not perforated."

"Meth," Pete guessed, which was probable, given the victim's age. He raised his voice. Either the Dictaphone was old or he wasn't used to using it. "The fingernails are professionally manicured. The nails are painted a bright red." He suggested to Sara, "Dr. Linton, perhaps you can check your side?"

Sara picked up the woman's hand. The body was in the early throes of rigor mortis. "Same on this hand. Manicured. Same polish." She didn't know why Pete was drawing such close attention to the fingernails. You couldn't throw a rock in Atlanta without hitting a nail salon.

He said, "The pedicure color is different."

Sara looked at the girl's toes. The nails were painted black.

Pete asked, "Is it normal for the toes to be different from the nails?"

Sara shrugged, as did Faith and Amanda.

"Well," Pete said, but the opening refrain from "Brick House" cut him off.

"Sorry." Leo Donnelly took his phone out of his pocket. He read the caller ID.

"It's the patrolman I sent to the airport. Daddy Snyder's probably outside." He answered the phone as he walked out the door. "Donnelly."

The room was quiet except for the hum of the motor on top of the walk-in refrigerator. Sara tried to get Will's attention, but he just stared at the floor.

"Jesus Christ." Faith wasn't cursing Donnelly—she was looking at the victim's face. "What the hell did he do to her?"

There was a click as Pete's foot tapped off the Dictaphone. He spoke to Sara, as if she'd been the one to ask the question. "Her eyes and mouth were sewn shut." Pete had to use both hands to hold open one of the torn eyelids. They were shredded in thick strips like the plastic curtain inside a butcher's freezer. "You can see where the thread ripped through the skin."

Sara asked, "How do you know this?"

Pete didn't answer the question. "These lines along her torso, inside her arms and legs—a thicker thread was used to keep her from moving. I imagine an upholstery needle was used, probably a waxed thread or maybe a silk-blend yarn. We'll probably find plenty of fibers to analyze."

Pete handed Sara the magnifying glass. She studied the lacerations. As with the victim's eyes and mouth, the skin was ripped apart, flesh hanging down in even intervals. She could see the red dots where the thread had gone in. Not once. Not a few times. The circles were like the holes in Sara's earlobes where she'd gotten her ears pierced when she was a child.

Amanda said, "She must've ripped herself away from the mattress, or whatever she was sewn to, when he started beating her."

Pete expounded on the hypothesis. "It would be an uncontrollable response. He punches her in the stomach, she curls up into a ball. Mouth opens. Eyes open. And then he punches her again and again."

Sara shook her head. He was jumping to some pretty quick conclusions. "What am I missing?"

Pete tucked his hands into the empty pockets of his lab coat, silently watching Sara with the same careful intensity he used when he was teaching a new procedure.

Amanda supplied, "This isn't our killer's first victim."

Sara still didn't understand. She asked Pete, "How do you know?"

Will cleared his throat. Sara had almost forgotten he was in the room.

He said, "Because the same thing was done to my mother."

June 15, 1975

LUCY BENNETT

Father's Day. It was all over the radio. Richway was having a special sale. Davis Brothers was offering an all-you-can-eat buffet. The disc jockeys were talking about their favorite gifts from years past. Shirts. Ties. Golf clubs.

Lucy's dad was easy to buy for. They always got him a bottle of scotch. Then two weeks would pass and if there was anything left in the bottle, they'd all get a drink on the Fourth of July while they watched the fireworks explode over Lake Spivey.

Lucy's dad.

She didn't want to think about him. About anyone she used to know.

Patty Hearst was suddenly in the news again. Her trial was still a year off, but her defense had decided to leak details about the kidnapping. Lucy already knew what went down with that crazy chick. It happened back when Lucy was on the street. There was no one else to talk about it with back then. Except for Kitty, none of the girls even knew Hearst's name. Or maybe Kitty was lying. She was good at lying, pretending she knew things when all it was in the end was an excuse to lure you in so she could stab you in the back like a sneaky little bitch.

After Hearst, there was a reporter with the Atlanta Constitution who'd been kidnapped. They demanded a million bucks for his release. They claimed to be from the SLA, too. What they were was idiots. They got snatched up by the cops. They didn't spend a dime of that money.

A million dollars. What would Lucy do with that kind of dough?

The only bank in town who'd had the ransom cash on hand was C&S. Mills Lane was the bank president. His picture was in the paper a lot. He was the same guy who helped the mayor build the stadium. Not the black mayor, but the one who ran against Lester Maddox.

Lucy felt the gurgle of laughter in her throat.

The Pickrick. Maddox's restaurant on West Peachtree. He kept axes on the wall. Rumor was he'd smash one through the head of any nigger who dared walk through the front door.

Lucy tried to imagine Juice going through the front door. An ax in his head. Brains splattered everywhere.

Washington-Rawson. The slum they'd torn down to build the Atlanta Stadium. Lucy's dad told her the story. They were there for a baseball game. The Braves. Chief Noc-a-Homa with his crazy big face running around with an ax he could've stolen from Lester Maddox. Lucy's dad said the stadium was supposed to revitalize the area. There were almost a million and a half residents in the city limits, most of them living on government vouchers. If Atlanta couldn't strong-arm the nigras out of the city, then they'd just pave over them.

The SLA paved over Patty Hearst. They were a cult. They brainwashed her. Or so said a doctor on the radio. The shrink was a woman, so Lucy took her opinion with a grain of salt, but she claimed that it only took two weeks for a person to become brainwashed.

Two weeks.

Lucy had lasted at least two months. Even after the H had worn off. Even after she had stopped longing for the high. Even after she had learned not to move, not to breathe too deep or too long. Even after she had stopped caring that she had sores on her back and legs from laying for so long in her own piss and shit.

She'd glowed with hate whenever he came into the room. She'd flinched when he touched her. She'd made sounds in her throat, used words that even without moving her mouth, she knew he could understand.

Satan.

Devil.

I'll kill you dead.

Motherfucker.

And then suddenly, he'd stopped coming. It had to be only a few days. You couldn't live without water for more than two, three days, tops. So maybe he'd been gone three days. Maybe when he'd come through the door, she'd been crying. Maybe when he brushed back her hair, she didn't flinch. Maybe when he washed her, she didn't tense up. And maybe when he finally got on top of her, finally did the things that Lucy had expected him to do from day one, she'd felt herself responding.

And then maybe when he left again, she sobbed for him. Longed for him. Begged for him. Missed him.

Just like she'd done with Bobby, her first love. Just like she'd done with Fred, the guy who cleaned planes at the airport. Then Chuck, who managed the apartment complex. Then countless others who had raped her, beat her, fucked her, left her on the side of the road for dead.

Stockholm syndrome.

That's what the woman doctor on CBS Radio called it. Walter Cronkite introduced her as a noted authority. She worked with victims of cults and mind-control experiments. She seemed to know what she was talking about, but maybe she was just making excuses, because what she was saying didn't entirely track.

At least not to Lucy.

Not to the girl who slept in her own excrement. Not to the girl who couldn't move her arms or legs. Not to the girl who couldn't open her mouth unless it was cut open for her. Couldn't blink without the razor sharp edge of his pocketknife slicing through the tiny stitches of thread.

The second Lucy saw an opening, the minute she saw even the sliver of a chance, she would escape. She would run to her freedom. She would crawl on her hands and knees back home. She would find her parents. She would find Henry. She would go to the cops. She would rip her body from this mattress and find a way to get home.

Patty Hearst was a stupid bitch. She was in a closet, but no one held her down. She had a chance. She had ample opportunity. She'd stood with a rifle in that bank, yelling SLA bullshit, when she could've just run out the door and asked for help.

If Lucy had a rifle, she'd use it to shoot the man in the head. She'd pound in his skull with the stock. She'd rape him with the long barrel. She'd laugh when the blood poured from his mouth and his eyeballs popped out.

And then she'd find that woman doctor from the radio and tell her that she was dead wrong. Patty Hearst wasn't helpless. She could've gotten away. She could've bolted at any time.

But then the doctor might point out that Lucy had something Patty Hearst did not.

Lucy wasn't alone anymore. She didn't need Bobby or Fred or Juice or her father or even Henry ever again. She no longer marked time by the feel of warm sunlight rising or falling across her face or the seasonal change in temperature. She marked her passage not in days, but in weeks and months and the cresting swell of her belly.

It would happen any day now.

Lucy was going to have a baby.

July 14, 1975

MONDAY

Captain Bubba Keller was one of Duke's poker buddies, which meant that he likely had his white robe pressed at the dry cleaner where Deena Coolidge's mother had died. Keller's wife would be the one dropping off his laundry. He probably had no idea who cleaned it.

Amanda had never given much thought to her father's Klan affiliation. The Klan still controlled the Atlanta Police Department when men like Duke Wagner and Bubba Keller joined. Membership was compulsory, the same as paying dues to the Fraternal Order of Police. Neither man had likely objected. They were both of German descent. They had both joined the Navy in hopes of being sent to the Pacific rather than having to fight in the European theater. They both wore their hair in tight military cuts. Their pants were always creased. Their ties were always straight. They took charge of things. They opened doors for ladies. They protected the innocent. They punished the guilty. They understood right and wrong.

That is to say, they were right and everyone else was wrong.

Back in the late sixties, Police Chief Herbert Jenkins had drummed the Klan out of the force, but most of the men with whom Duke played poker still honored the former affiliation. As far as Amanda could tell, membership consisted solely of sitting around and grouching about how much things had changed for the worse. All they could talk about was the good old days—how much better things had been before the coloreds ruined everything.

What they didn't acknowledge was that the things that made it bad for them made it better for everyone else. Over the last few days, Amanda had found herself thinking that injustice was never more tragic than when you found it knocking at your own door.

She tried to keep this in perspective as she walked into the Atlanta Jail. Captain Bubba Keller took pride in his post, though the Decatur Street building was despicable, worse than anything you'd find in Attica. Bats hung from the ceiling. The roof had gaping holes. The concrete floor was crumbling. During the winter, prisoners were allowed to sleep in the hallways rather than risk freezing to death inside their cells. Last year, a man had been rushed to Grady after being attacked by a rat. The creature chewed off most of his nose before the guards managed to beat it off with a broom.

The most surprising part of that story was not that there was a broom at the jail, but that a guard had noticed something was amiss. Security was lax. Most of the men were already inebriated when they showed up for work. Escapes were routine, a problem compounded by the fact that the secretarial pool was adjacent to the cells. Amanda had heard horror stories from some of the typists about rapists and murderers running past their desks on their way out the front doors.

“Ma’am,” a patrolman said, tipping his hat to Amanda as she walked up the stairs. He took a deep breath of fresh air as he headed toward the street. Amanda imagined she’d do the same thing when she left this nasty place. The smell was almost as bad as the projects.

She smiled at Larry Pearse, who ran the property room from behind a caged door. He gave her a wink as he sipped from his flask. Amanda waited until she was on the stairs to look at her watch. It wasn’t yet ten in the morning. Half the jail was probably lit.

The whir of Selectrics got louder as Amanda headed toward the typing pool. This had been her dream job, but now she couldn’t imagine sitting behind a desk all day. Nor could she imagine working for Bubba Keller. He was lecherous and bombastic, two things he didn’t bother to hide from Amanda, despite being close friends with Duke.

She often wondered what would happen if she told her father that Keller had grabbed her breast on more than one occasion, or about the time he’d pushed her up against the wall and whispered filthy things in her ear. Amanda wanted to think that Duke would be angry. That he would end the friendship. That he would pop Keller in the nose. The possibility that he might not do any of these things was likely what kept her from telling him.

True to form, she could hear Keller’s raised voice over the hum of typewriters. His office faced the typing pool, which was large and open. Sixty women sat behind rows of desks, diligently typing, pretending that they couldn’t hear what was going on a few yards away. Holly Scott, Keller’s secretary, stood in his open doorway. She was wise not to go in. Keller’s face was bright red. He waved his arms in the air, then swooped down his hand and pushed all the papers onto the floor.

“You goddamn do that!” he yelled. Holly mumbled something back, and he picked up his telephone and threw it against the wall. The plaster cracked, sending down a rain of white powder. “Clean up this mess!” Keller ordered, grabbing his hat and stomping out of his office. He stopped when he saw Amanda. “What the hell are you doing here?”

The lie came without much thought. “Butch Bonnie asked me to check—”

“I don’t care,” he interrupted. “Just don’t be here when I get back.”

Amanda watched him push his way toward the exit. He was the very definition of a bull in a china shop. Desks were shoved out of the way. Stacks of paper were knocked onto the floor. There were sixty women seated at sixty desks, working on sixty typewriters and trying their darndest not to be singled out.

And then finally, there was an audible, collective sigh of relief as Keller left the room. The typewriters were momentarily silenced. Someone screamed back in the cells.

Holly said, “Good night, Irene.”

Titters of laughter went around the room. The typewriters whirled back into motion. Holly waved Amanda back into Keller's office.

"Goodness," Amanda said. "What was that about?"

Holly bent over, picking up a broken bottle of Old Grand-Dad bourbon. "I just lost it."

Amanda knelt down to help her pick up the scattered papers. "Lost it how?"

"We're all trying to get Reggie's new handbook typed for the printer." Holly tossed the broken glass into the trashcan. "We're on deadline. The brass is breathing down our necks. Breathing down Keller's."

"And?"

"And so Keller thinks that's the perfect time to call me into his office and tell me to show him my tits."

Amanda sighed. She was familiar with the request. It was usually followed by a disturbing laugh and a groping hand. "And?"

"And, I told him I was going to file a complaint against him."

Amanda picked up the telephone. The plastic was cracked, but it still had a dial tone. "Would you really do it?"

"Probably not," Holly admitted. "My husband told me if he does it again, to just get my purse and leave."

"Why don't you?"

"Because that asshole's one more tantrum away from a heart attack. I'm going to outlive him if it kills me." She scooped up the last of the papers. There was a smile on her face. "What're you doing here, anyway?"

"I need to talk to an inmate."

"White or black?"

"Black."

"Good. There's an awful case of lice being passed around." Everyone knew the coloreds didn't get lice. "Keller's going to have to set off a can of DDT back there. It's the third time this year. The smell is just awful." Holly took a pen off the desk and held it over a sheet of paper. "Who's the girl?"

Amanda felt a thickness in her throat. "Male."

Holly dropped the pen. "You want to go back there and talk to a black man?"

"Dwayne Mathison."

"My God, Mandy. Are you crazy? He killed a white woman. He already confessed."

"I just need a few minutes."

"No." She vehemently shook her head. "Keller would have my scalp. And rightfully so. I've never heard anything so crazy. Why on earth would you want to talk to him?"

Not for the first time, Amanda realized that she would be better served to plan out her explanations in advance. "It's for one of my cases."

"What case?" Holly sat down at the desk to organize the papers. There were two more bottles of bourbon on the blotter, one of them almost empty. The cut-crystal glass between them showed a permanent ring from Keller's constantly replenishing his drink throughout the day. Crude renderings of a penis and a pair of breasts were carved into the soft wood of the desk.

Holly looked up at her. "What is it?"

Amanda pulled around another chair, just as Trey Callahan had this morning at the Union Mission. She sat across from Holly. Their knees were almost touching. "There are some missing girls."

Holly stopped collating. "You think the pimp killed them, too?"

Amanda didn't outright lie. "Maybe."

"You should tell Butch and Rick. It's their case. And you know they're going to hear about this." She put one hand on her heart and held up the other, as if swearing allegiance. "They won't hear about it from me or my girls, but you know it'll get around."

"I know." There was nothing more prevalent in any police force than gossip. "But I want to do it."

"Mandy." Holly shook her head, as if she couldn't understand what had happened to her friend. "Why are you inviting trouble?"

Amanda stared at her. Holly Scott had a dancer's lean body. She ironed her long red hair straight. Her makeup was expertly applied. Her skin was perfect. Even in this miserable heat, she could be photographed for a magazine ad. That she took near-perfect dictation and could type 110 words a minute were probably factors Keller had not even considered when he'd hired her.

Amanda reached back and closed the door. The typewriters were just as loud, but it engendered a feeling of confidentiality.

She told Holly, "Rick Landry threatened me." She didn't feel right bringing Evelyn's name into this, but Amanda was telling the truth when she said, "He called me a slit in front of my boss. He cursed at me. He told me I should stay the ... the F away from his case."

Holly's lips pressed together in a straight line. "Aren't you going to listen to him?"

"No," Amanda said. "I'm not. I'm tired of listening to them. I'm tired of being scared of them and doing all their bidding when I know better than they do."

The words were said quietly, but there was an air of revolution about them.

Holly nervously glanced over Amanda's shoulder. She was afraid of being heard. She was afraid of being any part of this. Still, she asked, "Have you ever been into men's holding?"

"No."

"It's awful down there. Worse than the women's side."

"I assumed it would be."

"Rats. Feces. Blood."

"Don't oversell it."

"Keller will be furious."

Amanda forced up her shoulders in a shrug. "Maybe this will give him that heart attack you've been waiting for."

Holly stared at her for a good long while. Her blue eyes glistened with tears that did not fall. She was visibly afraid. Amanda knew she had a kid and a husband who worked two jobs so they could live in the suburbs. Holly went to school at night. She helped out at church on Sundays. She volunteered at the library. And she came here five days a week and put up with Keller's advances and innuendo because the city was the only employer around that followed the federal law mandating women be paid the same salary as men.

And yet, Holly held Amanda's gaze as she reached over for the phone on Keller's desk. Her finger found the dial. There was a slight tremor in her hand. She didn't have to look down as she dragged the rotary back and forth. Holly put through calls for Keller all day long. She was silent as she waited for the line to engage. "Martha," she said. "This is Holly up in Keller's office. I need you to have a prisoner transferred to holding for me."

Amanda watched her carefully as Holly relayed Dwayne Mathison's information. She had to shuffle through the papers from Keller's desk to get his arrest record, which had his booking number. Her hands steadied as they performed the familiar task. Her nails were short and clear-coated, like Amanda's. Her skin was almost as white as Jane Delray's, though of course absent any track marks. Amanda could see the thin blue lines of the veins in the back of the other woman's hand.

She looked down at her own hands, which were clasped in her lap. Her nails were neatly trimmed, though she hadn't bothered with polish the night before. The skin along the side of her palm was scratched. Amanda didn't remember injuring herself. Maybe she'd scraped off the skin while she was cleaning her father's house. There was a piece of metal sticking out of the refrigerator that always caught her hand when she cleaned it out.

Holly put down the phone. "He's being transferred. It'll be about ten minutes." She paused. "I can call them back, you know. You don't have to go through with this."

Amanda had other things on her mind. "Can I use the phone while I wait?"

"Sure." Holly groaned as she hefted the phone around. "I'll be outside. I'll let you know when they're ready."

Amanda found her address book in her purse. She should be scared about coming face-to-face with Juice again, but looking at her scratched hand had put a question in her mind.

She kept an index card in the back of her address book that listed the numbers she used on a daily basis. Butch was constantly leaving out details in his notes. Amanda had to call the morgue at least once a week. She usually talked to the woman who handled the filing, but today she asked for Pete Hanson.

The phone was picked up on the third ring. "Coolidge."

Amanda considered hanging up, but then she had a flash of paranoia, as if Deena Coolidge could somehow see her. The jail was only a few buildings down from the morgue. Amanda glanced around nervously.

Deena said, "Hell-o?"

"It's Amanda Wagner."

The woman let some time pass. "Uh-huh."

Amanda looked out into the typing pool. All the women were hard at work, backs straight, heads slightly tilted, as they typed the pages of a handbook that would more than likely be used as toilet paper by half the force and target practice by the other. "I had a question for Dr. Hanson," Amanda said. "If he's around?"

"He's in court all day testifying on a case." Deena seemed to lose some of her wariness. "May I help you with something?"

Amanda closed her eyes. This would be so much easier with Pete. "I had a question about the piece of skin found under the victim's fingernail." Amanda looked down at the scratch on her palm. "I was wondering—" She couldn't do this. Maybe she would wait for Pete. He would probably be back in the office tomorrow. Jane Delray wouldn't be any more dead by then.

Deena said, "Come on, girl. Don't waste my time. Spit it out."
"Pete found something under the girl's fingernail on Saturday."
"Right. Skin tissue. She must've scratched her assailant."
"Did you analyze it yet?"
"Not yet. Why?"

Amanda shook her head, wishing she could just melt into the chair. It was probably best to just blurt it out. "If the attacker was Negro, wouldn't the skin under the girl's fingernail be black?"

"Hm." Deena was quiet for a few seconds. "Well, you know, Pete's got this special light. You shine it on the skin sample and it glows this kind of orange if it's from a Negro."

"Really?" Amanda had never heard of such a thing. "Did he test the skin yet? Because I think—"

At first, she thought Deena was crying. Then Amanda realized the woman was laughing so hard that she had started gulping for air.

"Oh, very funny," Amanda said. "I'm hanging up now."

"No, wait—" Deena was still laughing, though she was obviously trying to get it under control. "Wait. Don't hang up." She kept laughing. Amanda looked down at Keller's desk. Cigarette butts spilled out of the ashtray. His coffee cup was rimmed in an orange nicotine stain. "Okay," Deena said. "All right." And then she started laughing again.

"I'm really hanging up now."

"No, wait." She coughed a few times. "I'm good now. I'm good."

"I was asking a sincere question."

"I know you were, honey. I know." She coughed again. "Listen, you know that Pure and Simple lotion ad, shows the different layers of skin?"

Amanda couldn't tell whether or not she was setting up another joke.

"I'm serious, girl. Listen to me."

"Okay, I know the ad."

"The skin basically has three layers. All right?"

"All right."

"Usually, when you scratch someone, you get the upper dermis, which is white no matter who you are. In order to get the pigmented layer of skin, the black part, you'd have to scratch to the subcutis, which means the fingernail would have to go deep enough to cause some serious bleeding. And it wouldn't be a sliver of skin you'd have to scrape out from under the fingernail. It'd be a chunk."

Amanda detected Pete's patient teaching tone in the woman's words. "So, there's no way to tell if the girl from Friday scratched a black assailant or a white one?"

Deena was quiet again, though this time, she wasn't laughing. "You're talking about that pimp they arrested for killing that white girl, aren't you?"

Amanda saw a guard standing by Holly's desk. He was gangly, with an untrimmed mustache and dark hair. Holly waved Amanda over. Juice was ready.

"Amanda?" Deena asked. "I'm not playing now. You best think about what you're doing."

"I assumed you'd be eager to help one of your own kind."

"That murdering bastard ain't got nothing to do with me." She lowered her voice. "I'm eager to keep my head attached to my shoulders, is what I am."

"Well, thank you for answering my question."

"Wait."

Holly's waving took on an urgency. She was probably afraid Keller would return. Amanda held up her finger, indicating she needed a minute. "What is it?"

"Be careful. The same people protecting you right now are gonna be the same ones coming after you when they find out what you're doing."

There was a long silence after that. Both of them reflected on the words.

"Thank you." Amanda tried not to read anything into Deena's gruff goodbye. She hung up the phone. Her heart was thumping in her chest. The woman was right. Duke would be furious if he knew what Amanda was doing. So would Keller. So would Butch and Landry and possibly Hodge. Add the whole department to that if they found out she was trying to help a black man get out of jail. A black man who'd already confessed to murder.

Holly came to the doorway. "Hurry up, Mandy. Phillip's going to take you down and stay with you." She lowered her voice. "He's not so bad."

Amanda felt the urge to flee. Her bravado was going up and down like a piston engine. "I'm ready."

She stood from the desk. She forced a smile onto her face as Phillip came into the office. He was wearing the dark blue uniform of the prison guards, a set of keys hanging from one side of his belt and a nightstick dangling from the other.

He was younger than Amanda, but he talked to her as if she was a child. "You sure you wanna be doing this, gal?"

Amanda swallowed past the lump in her throat. She wished that Evelyn were there to give her strength. Then she felt guilty, because Evelyn had been taking the brunt of the anger lately—not just from Rick Landry, but from Butch and whoever had transferred her into Model City.

Maybe Evelyn was right. Maybe people were careful with Amanda because they were afraid of Duke. Instead of being afraid of him herself, Amanda should be taking advantage of it. At least for as long as she could.

"I'm not sure we've met." Amanda walked toward the man, hand extended. "I'm Amanda Wagner. Duke's daughter."

His eyes shifted to Holly, then to Amanda as he shook her hand. "Yeah, I know Duke."

"He's friends with Bubba." Amanda never called Keller by his first name, but the guard needn't know that. She took her purse out of the chair and dug around for the new pen and spiral-bound notebook she'd brought from home. She handed her bag to Holly. "Mind holding on to this for me?"

Holly stared wide-eyed as Amanda walked out of the office. She forced herself to keep a steady pace as she passed through the typing pool. The constant spinning and pecking of the Selectric balls seemed to match the erratic beats of her heart, but Amanda forced herself to keep walking. Going into the men's jail was likely the same as going into a swimming pool. You either jumped in and experienced that quick shock of cold or you dragged it out, walking in slowly, your skin prickling with goose bumps, your teeth chattering.

Amanda jumped right in.

She held on to the railing as she walked down the stairs. She didn't wait for Phillip to open the door. She pushed it with the palm of her hand. The cells. Holly was right. The men's side was far worse than the women's. Large cracks split the walls. Pigeons cooed from the rafters; their droppings littered the concrete floor. She stepped over a passed-out wino leaning against the wall. She ignored the catcalls and the stares. She kept her posture straight, her eyes ahead, until Phillip spoke.

"It's on the left."

Amanda stopped in front of a door. Someone had used a knife to carve INTERROGATION into the thick lead paint. There was a square window at eye level, though the glass was nearly opaque with grime.

Phillip took out a set of keys and searched for the right one. He swayed slightly, obviously from drink. Finally, he found the correct key. He slid it into the lock and pushed open the door. Amanda turned around, preventing him from going in.

She said, "I've got it from here."

He laughed, then saw she was serious. "Are you nuts?"

"I'll call you if I need you."

"That ain't gonna be enough time." He indicated the door. "This thing locks when you close it. I can leave it cracked so—"

"Thank you." She pulled one of Rick Landry's moves, closing the space between them, forcing him back without having to touch him. The last thing she saw of Phillip was the shocked expression on his face when she closed the door.

The clicking of the latch echoed in the room. She caught a glimpse of the guard's blue hat, just the rim, in the window, but nothing else.

And then she turned around.

Dwayne Mathison was sitting at the table. A bloody white bandage was wrapped around his head. One of his eyes was swollen shut. His nose was broken. He had pulled back his chair several feet, so it was almost touching the wall. Amanda recognized his clothes as the same he'd had on last week, though they were stained with blood and dirt now. His legs were wide apart. His arm hung over the back of the chair, fingers nearly touching the floor. She could see the Jesus tattoo on his chest. The mole on his cheek. The hate in his eyes.

"Whatchu doin' here, bitch?"

It was a good question. Amanda had never before interviewed a suspect in a proper interrogation room. She was usually in the suspect's home. His parents were in the room, sometimes a lawyer. The boys were always contrite, terrified to be talking to a police officer, though relieved it was just a woman. Their fathers assured Amanda that it would never happen again. Their mothers revealed salacious details about the girl who'd made the allegations. Generally, it was over in less than an hour and the boy was left to get on with his life.

So what was she doing here?

Amanda hugged her notebook to her chest, then regretted the move. Juice would think she was covering her breasts. He would think she was scared. Both of which were true, but she couldn't let him know that. She dropped her arms as she walked to the table. The room was small. It was just a few steps. She dragged back the empty chair and sat down. Juice was watching her the way an animal studies prey. Amanda pulled the chair closer to the table, though every muscle in her body was tingling with the desire to flee.

In seconds, he could lurch across the table and snap her neck. He could punch her. Beat her. Try to rape her again. Amanda had always worried that if something bad happened—a man broke into her apartment in the middle of the night, an attacker cornered her in an alley—she would not be able to scream. She hadn't screamed before when Juice had threatened her. Could she scream now if he lunged for her? Would Phillip even hear her? If he did, would he be able to find his keys in time to stop the worst of it?

Amanda couldn't generate enough saliva in her mouth to swallow. She opened her notebook. "Mr. Mathison, I understand that you've confessed to the murder of Lucy Bennett?"

He didn't answer.

Water dripped from a hole in the ceiling. The drops had puddled on the floor. There was a dead rat in the corner, its neck broken by a trap. Cobwebs filled the corners. The air stank of sweat mixed with the distinctive ammonia smell of dried urine.

She said, "Mr. Math—"

"Mm-mm." Juice slowly licked his tongue along his top lip. "You still a fine-lookin' woman." He made a tscking noise. "Shoulda took you when I had the chance."

Incongruously, Amanda felt a smile wanting to come to her lips. She could hear Evelyn's voice, the way she'd mimicked Juice when they were at the Varsity.

Her tone was surprisingly strong when she said, "Well, you lost your chance." Amanda clicked her pen so she could take notes. "What happened to Jane Delray?"

He made a noise somewhere between a grunt and a groan. "Why you askin' after that bitch?"

"I want to know where she is."

He held his hand up above his head and whistled like a dive-bombing airplane as he dropped it to the table.

Amanda looked at his hand. Two of his fingers were taped together with surgical tape. There were no scratches on his hands, his bare arms. "You confessed to killing Lucy Bennett."

"I confessed to keepin' my black ass outta the 'lectric chair."

"The death penalty is no longer legal."

"They say they gone bring it back for me."

Given the circumstances, Amanda didn't doubt that the state would try. Everyone knew it was only a matter of time before Old Sparky was powered back up again.

She said, "We both know you didn't kill that woman."

"Wished I woulda."

"Why didn't you?"

"Why you here, bitch? Why you care what happen to a nigger?"

"I don't, actually." Amanda was startled by the truth of her own words. "I care about the girls."

" 'Cause they white."

"No." Again, she told him the truth. "Because they're girls. Because no one else cares about them."

He looked at her. Amanda hadn't realized until that moment that Juice had been avoiding her eyes. She stared back at him, wondering if she was the first woman who'd had the courage to do so. He must have a mother somewhere. A sister. He couldn't rape and whore out every woman he met.

Juice tapped his hand on the table. Amanda didn't look away, but Juice did. "You're like her."

"Like who?"

"Lucy." He kept tapping his fingers on the tabletop. "She strong. Too strong. I break her down. But she always get back up."

"Was Kitty like that, too?"

"Kitty." He snorted. "That bitch near about broke me, you hear what I'm sayin'? Had to beat her down and keep her down." He pointed at Amanda. "You run them gals long enough, you see the strongest one's the one what's gonna be most loyal. All's you gotta do is find you way in."

"I'll keep that in mind if I ever decide to trick out women."

He put his palms flat on the table and leaned toward her. "I trick you out, bitch. Gimme five minutes with that fine white ass." He started thrusting his hips, banging against the table. "Dig my hands in that juicy white meat. Stick it in ya till ya cryin'." He banged harder against the table, punctuating each thrust with a deep moan. It was a guttural sound that made her note the dark bruises on his throat.

She asked, "Would you choke me?"

"I choke you, bitch." He pushed one last time against the table. "I choke you till you come so hard you pass out."

"Do you like being choked?"

"Shit." He crossed his arms over his chest. His biceps were huge. "Ain't nobody chokin' this brother."

Amanda remembered something Pete had said in the morgue. "Did you urinate on yourself?"

"I ain't piss myself." He tilted up his chin defensively. "Who told you that?"

Amanda felt a smug smile on her lips. "You just did."

He stared at the wall.

"The apartment at Techwood. That's Kitty's, isn't it?"

He didn't answer.

"I can stay here all day," she told him, and in that moment, Amanda could see herself doing just that. Bubba Keller would have to drag her from this room. She would sit here staring down this disgusting pimp for as long as it took. "The apartment at Techwood belonged to Kitty, did it not?"

Juice seemed to understand her resolve. "That's all'a them girls'. She charge it out. Tryin' to pimp 'em space. I put a stop to that."

Amanda couldn't imagine another woman charging rent to whores, but in the last few days, her worldview had expanded considerably. "Tell me about Hank Bennett."

"What he tell you?"

"You tell me about him."

"Fool came onto my corner trying to order me around." His fist was clenched when he banged it on the table. "Man need to step back."

"When was this?"

"I don't know, bitch. I ain't keep a calendar."

Amanda made a slash mark on the paper. If she had a dollar for every time a man had called her "bitch" lately, she could retire. "Did Hank Bennett see you before or after Lucy disappeared?"

His tongue darted out as he thought it over. "Before. Yeah, before. Bitch up and gone a week, two week later. I figure he took her. Lucy talk about him all the time."

Amanda's dictation was rusty, but it came back to her as she scribbled notes across the page. "So, Hank Bennett approached you before Lucy disappeared?" Another lie they'd caught the lawyer in. "What did he want?"

"Wanted to tell me my bidness. Brother better be glad I didn't beat down his skinny white ass."

"What business?"

"Told me cut Kitty loose. Said he'd pass me some bills if I stop givin' her the Boy."

Amanda was sure she'd heard wrong. "Kitty? You mean Lucy."

"Naw, bitch. It was Kitty he wanted to talk about. Dude had a hard-on for her."

"Why would Hank Bennett care about Kitty?"

He shrugged his shoulders, but still answered, "Her daddy some big-time lawyer. Disowned the bitch when he found out she was sippin' some Juice." He gave her a lurid grin, making sure she got his meaning. "She got another sister somewhere. She the good one. Kitty always been bad."

"Kitty's father is Andrew Treadwell."

He nodded. "You finally gettin' it, bitch. Ain't the mayor tell you this already?"

Amanda flipped back through her notes. "Hank Bennett offered you money to stop giving Kitty heroin."

"Why you keep repeatin' everything I say?"

"Because it doesn't make sense," Amanda admitted. "Hank Bennett comes to you about Kitty. He doesn't ask about his sister? Ask to see her?" Juice shook his head. "He's not worried about Lucy?" Again, Juice shook his head. "And, a week later, Lucy disappeared?"

"Yeah, an' about a week after—" He snapped his fingers. "Kitty gone."

Amanda remembered Jane's words. "Just disappeared."

"Thass right."

"What about Mary?"

He snorted. "Bitch gone, too. 'Bout two, three months later. Ain't been a while since I lose that many girls at a go. Usually some other pimp tryin' to poach me off."

"You had three girls disappear in as many months." Amanda wasn't asking him a question. She was trying to get her head around what had happened. "Did you ever see Lucy with a letter from her brother?"

He gave a curt nod. "Had it in her purse."

"Can you read?"

"Bitch, I ain't ignert."

Amanda waited.

"Some bullshit 'bout how he missed her when I knowed that ain't the truth.

Said he wanted to meet with her.” Juice thumped the table with his fingers. “Shee-it, brother wanna see her, he coulda spent five mo’ minutes on my corner. I tole him she be right there.”

Amanda scribbled down his words as she tried to think through her next question. “Was there anyone hanging around who was ...” “Scary” wasn’t the right word for a man like Juice. “Who wasn’t right? Someone who was dangerous or violent? Someone you wouldn’t trust with your girls?”

“Bitch, I charge extry for that.” He smiled. One of his front teeth was missing. The gum was raw. “They some weird motherfuckers out there.” He cleared his throat. “ ’Scuse me.”

Amanda nodded at the apology. “What weird people?”

“They’s a dude likes to fist ’em.” He pumped his fist in the air. Amanda guessed he meant punching the girls. “They’s one use a knife, but he all right. He never stick nobody. Least not with the blade.”

“Anyone else?”

“They’s that tall dude runs the soup kitchen.”

“I’ve heard about him.”

“He real tight with the dude at the mission.”

So, Trey Callahan had lied to them, too.

“Dude always comin’ ’round at night, trying to preach to my gals.”

“The man from the soup kitchen?” Juice nodded. “Were the girls ever afraid of him?”

“Shit. They ain’t afraid’a nothin’ when I’m around. That’s my job, bitch.”

She made yet another slash on the paper. “This man from the church came at night to your street corner and tried to preach to Lucy and Kitty and—”

“Nah, they gone by then. Mary, too.” He sat up in his chair. “Lookit, that salvation shit okay during the day, but don’t come shootin’ off ’bout Jesus while I’m tryin’ to do my bidness. You feel me?”

“I do.” Amanda leaned forward. “Tell me who killed Jane Delray.”

“You get me outta here?”

Amanda was getting good at this game, but she wasn’t quite there yet. Juice obviously read her expression.

“Shit.” He slumped back in his chair. “You cain’t do nothin’, bitch.”

“If I could find someone from City Hall to talk to you, could you tell him who killed Jane?”

“Another slit?”

“No, a man. Someone in charge.” Amanda didn’t know anyone downtown except for a bunch of secretaries. Still, she kept her shoulders straight, put some threat into her tone. “But you have to tell him something meaningful. You have to give him a name that can be followed up on. Otherwise, that deal you made with Butch and Landry goes out the window. I promise you, the state will bring back the death penalty. By the time it goes to the Supreme Court, you’ll be dead.”

There was a tapping sound. His leg had started moving up and down. The heel of his patent leather shoe clicked against the concrete. “I gotta deal. Done made my confession.”

“That doesn’t matter anymore.”

“Whatchu mean?”

"I mean, you confessed to killing Lucy Bennett, not Jane Delray. Once I tell them about the mistake—" She shrugged. "I hope they remember to shave your head before they strap that metal cap on."

He was nervous. His breath whistled through his broken nose. "Whatchu mean, bitch?"

"You hear about the last guy they executed? His hair caught on fire. The switch was too hot. They couldn't turn it off. He burned alive. Flames went as high as the ceiling. He screamed for two whole minutes before they found the junction box and shut it down."

Juice's throat worked. His leg was shaking so hard that his knee bumped the table.

"Give me a name, Juice. Tell me who killed Jane."

His fist clenched and unclenched. The table trembled.

"Give me a name."

He pounded his fist against the table. "I ain't gotta name!"

Amanda clicked her pen. She closed her notebook. She hadn't flinched. She kept perfectly calm, waiting.

"Got damn." He spoke through clenched teeth. "Got damn them bitches. Gettin' me on the hook for this shit."

"Who would want to kill Jane?"

"Ever'body," he said. "She mouth off all the time. Make enemies on the street."

"Anyone who would murder her?"

"Not without gettin' they throat slit. Bitch kept a knife in her purse. All them do. Girl knew how to use it. Cain't turn your back on her fo' a minute. Bitch mean as a snake."

"That's pretty rich coming from her pimp."

He didn't respond. His shoulders rounded. He gripped his hands in his lap. "What'd that other bitch say? 'Bout Kitty knowin' the mayor? You think he can give a brother a hand? Get me outta this mess?"

"I told you, if you tell me the truth, maybe I can help you."

He stared at her, eyes going back and forth as if he was reading a book.

"Shee-it," he mumbled. "You think they gone lissen to you?" He pushed himself up from the table. Amanda's body tensed, but she stayed seated as he loomed over her. "Look 'round you, bitch." He held out his hands. "They let a black man run this world 'fore they let a slit do."

* * *

Amanda stood at Evelyn's front door with a bottle of wine in her hand. It wasn't the cheap stuff, but she was uncertain whether or not price had anything to do with taste. As with many things, she was out of her element. Especially when Kenny Mitchell opened the door.

A smile spread across his mouth. His teeth were perfect. His face was perfect. There wasn't anything about him she would change. Not that Amanda would be given the chance.

He said, "Amanda. Great to see you again." He leaned toward her, and without thinking, Amanda pulled back.

"Oh," she said, then leaned back in, looking more like a pecking duck than a grown woman. The moment could've been made more awkward, but Kenny laughed as he put his hand to her face and kissed her cheek. She could feel the rough texture of his skin, the prickly hairs of his mustache. His other hand rested lightly on her arm. A rush of heat went straight through her.

"Come in." He held open the door. Amanda walked into the house, feeling instantly enveloped by the cool air. "It's nice, right?" Kenny took the bottle of wine from her. Every move he made had a certain kind of grace, like an athlete on the field. "Ev's in back putting down the kid. I'm afraid that odor you smell is from me and Bill trying to cook supper. May I bring you a glass of wine?" He looked at the bottle and gave a low whistle. "Classy stuff. Maybe I'll keep it for myself."

"That's fine," Amanda said, not sure which question she was answering. She looked down at the floor, surprised to see that her feet were still there, that she wasn't melting into a bubbling pool of adolescent giddiness. "Whatever you like."

Kenny seemed not to notice, or maybe he was used to women acting so foolishly around him. He pointed down the hallway. "First door on the right."

Amanda felt his eyes on her as she walked down the hallway. Oddly, she thought about Juice, the things he'd said about her bottom. Amanda bit her lip. Why, of all the things the pimp had said, had that particular one stuck in her head? Surely, Kenny wasn't like that. He wasn't craven or crude. Neither was Amanda, which didn't explain the obscene images that were flashing in her mind as she gently knocked on the bedroom door.

Evelyn whispered, "Come in."

Amanda pushed open the door. Evelyn was sitting in a rocking chair. Zeke was in her arms. His head was flopped back. His arm hung down to the side. He was towheaded with pink cheeks and a button nose. It wasn't surprising that Evelyn had such a beautiful baby. Or that his nursery was so playfully decorated. Fluffy white sheep were painted on the light blue walls. His crib was a glossy white. The yellow in the sheets matched the carpet, which in turn matched the glowing nightlight that provided the only illumination in the room.

"You look nice," Evelyn whispered.

"Thank you." Amanda self-consciously patted her hair. She'd washed it four times in an attempt to remove the odors from the jail, then dabbed some Charlie on her wrists and neck for other reasons. "Do you want me to help in the kitchen?"

"No, it's Bill's night." Evelyn groaned as she leveraged herself out of the chair. She cradled Zeke as she carried him to the crib. He flopped onto the mattress like a rag doll. Evelyn pulled up the sheet and tucked it around his narrow shoulders. Her fingers brushed back his hair. She leaned down and kissed his cheek before indicating they should leave.

Instead of heading toward the kitchen, Evelyn took Amanda into the next room. Her dress was a short blue crinoline that rustled as she walked. She turned on the overhead light, revealing an office. Two desks were on opposite walls. Both were very tidy. Amanda guessed the black metal desk belonged to Bill Mitchell. She doubted he was using the elegantly curved white rococo desk with pink glass knobs. Evelyn's spiral notebook was neatly lined up to the edge. A grocery list was beside it. Most remarkably, their earlier project was displayed on the wall. Evelyn had used thumbtacks to pin up the various pieces of construction paper.

"I thought it would be easier this way." Evelyn rolled Bill's chair over for Amanda. She sat down at her desk and opened the top drawer. "I found these at the Five."

Amanda took the licenses. Lucy Anne Bennett. Kathryn Elizabeth Treadwell. Mary Louise Eitel. Donna Mary Halston. Mary Abigail Ellis.

She studied the photos carefully and set aside two of the Marys, leaving Donna Mary Halston. "This one looks like Kitty and Lucy."

"That's what I thought."

"He has a type." Amanda had never considered such a thing, but of course it made sense. Men always had certain types they were attracted to. Why would murder be any different?

Evelyn said, "They all look so normal. You'd never guess what they were doing."

Amanda stared at the girls' photographs. They did look normal. There was nothing to suggest that they were prostitutes, nothing to indicate they had sunk to the lowest levels of depravity in order to feed an addiction.

Most striking was their similarity. Long blonde hair. Blue eyes. Tall and slim. Lush lips. Expressive eyes. They were not just pretty, but beautiful. "They all list the same address," Amanda noted. "Techwood Homes. I can call back Pam Canale and see if she can trace the apartment to a roll number. I have a feeling it belongs to Kitty, but it wouldn't kill us to be certain." An idea occurred to her. "We could take these license photos to Techwood tomorrow. Like you said, it's ninety percent black there. Three white girls would stick out."

"That's good. You hold on to them." Evelyn grabbed her notebook off the desk, but didn't open it. "I checked all the missing persons files at the rest of the precinct. There was nothing for Lucy or Jane, but I found one for Mary Halston. She has a sister who lives in Virginia who's been looking for her for almost a year."

"We could call her." Amanda tucked the licenses into her purse. "I'm sure she'd talk to us."

"We'll have to do it from here. If we call long-distance from the station, they'll have our hides."

Their hides were already in enough jeopardy. "Did anything else stick out?"

"I checked the DNF." She looked down at the notebook. "None of them seemed to match our case. But all those missing girls, Amanda. At least twenty of them, and no one thought to do anything but shove them in a file at the back of the cabinet." She slowly shook her head. Amanda felt ashamed for having told her about it in the first place.

Evelyn continued, "They're dead, or they've been abducted, or hurt, and no one cares. Or at least no one knows to care. They must have families who are looking for them. But there are hardly any missing persons reports on black women. I guess their families know it doesn't matter. At least not ..." Her voice trailed off as she opened her notebook. "I wrote down their names. I don't know why. I just thought that somebody should. Somebody has to acknowledge that they're gone."

Amanda looked at the long list of women's names. All dead. All tossed into files that no one ever looked at.

Evelyn let out a long sigh. She put the notebook back on her desk. "How was the jail?"

"Disgusting." Amanda dug around in her purse, though she hardly needed to refer to her notes. "Juice confessed to killing Lucy Bennett, but only to avoid the death penalty."

"Did no one explain to him that we're no longer allowed to execute people?"

"They said they'd bring it back for him."

Evelyn nodded. "I suppose that's a smart move on Juice's part, then."

"If you want to spend the rest of your life in prison." Amanda opened her notebook. "He confirmed Kitty is Andrew Treadwell's daughter."

"Well." She smiled smugly. "Our black sheep theory was correct."

"I wouldn't hold my breath for a commendation," Amanda advised. "Here's the best part: Juice said that Hank Bennett came to see him a week or so before Lucy disappeared."

Evelyn grunted. "God, that man would rather climb a tree and lie than stand on the ground and tell the truth." She took the pen off her desk and stood up to write on the puzzle wall. "Saw sister one week prior to disappearance," she called out, writing down the words under Hank Bennett's name. "What else did Juice say?"

"Hank Bennett told him to cut Kitty off heroin."

"You mean Lucy?"

"No, I mean Kitty."

Evelyn turned around. "Why would Hank Bennett want Juice to cut Kitty off heroin?"

Amanda pulled a Sergeant Hodge. "That's an interesting question."

Evelyn groaned as she looked back at the puzzle. "Maybe Andrew Treadwell sent Hank Bennett to get Kitty cleaned up."

"Maybe."

Amanda could tell she wasn't convinced. "Okay, try this: Trey Callahan at the Union Mission said that Kitty stuck out from the other girls. She was obviously from an upper class. It wouldn't take much poking around to find out who her people were. Maybe Juice tried to blackmail Treadwell, and Treadwell sent Hank Bennett to do his dirty work." She scanned her notes. "Juice said it himself, that Bennett offered him money to get Kitty off the Boy."

Evelyn breathed a heavy sigh. "Bennett went to bribe Juice about Kitty, but then he saw that his sister was there?"

"Juice said that Bennett didn't see Lucy that time, but who knows? They all lie."

"Yes, they do." Evelyn bent down and studied the yellow page with the timeline drawn out. "We need to update this. Call it out to me."

"Thanks for taking the hard part." Amanda flipped through her notes as Evelyn waited. "Okay. The letter for Lucy Bennett comes to the Union Mission. We have both Trey Callahan and Juice confirming that."

Evelyn took out a new piece of blue construction paper, stuck it on the wall, and wrote THE LETTER across the center. "Did Juice know what it said?"

"That he wanted to see his sister. That he missed her. Juice took it for a load of bull."

“Look at me, agreeing with a pimp.”

Amanda continued, “Hank Bennett shows up at the mission a few days later and talks to Trey Callahan. Then, presumably soon after, he goes to Juice on his street corner. He sees Kitty instead. He tells Juice to cut Kitty loose. He doesn’t ask about his sister.” She squinted at her scribbles. “Juice made a point of telling me that he told Bennett to wait around for a few minutes, that Lucy would be right along, but Bennett didn’t wait.”

Evelyn guessed, “So, seeing Kitty put finding Lucy on the back burner for our boy lawyer.”

“Evidently,” Amanda concurred. “Then, two weeks later, Lucy is gone. A week or so after that, Kitty is gone. And then Mary disappeared after that.” Amanda looked up from the notebook. “Three girls gone. But why?”

“Tell me so I can stop writing,” Evelyn shook a cramp out of her hand before she finished the updating. Finally, she stood back and stared at the timeline. They both did. The puzzle was sprawling now, different bits of information floating around without a seeming connection. “I feel like we’re missing something.”

“Okay—” Amanda stood up. Pacing sometimes helped her think. “Let’s think about it this way: Bennett was trying to get in touch with his sister. His father was dead. His mother wanted to see her daughter, to let her know what had happened. So Hank goes to the streets looking for Lucy, only he finds Kitty Treadwell.”

“All right.”

“Bennett said that he sent Lucy the letter in August. He remembered it because he’d just graduated law school and his father was recently deceased. Later, he told us that he was a first-year associate at Treadwell-Price.”

“Oh-h-h.” Evelyn drew out the word. She picked up her pen and wrote down the approximate dates. “Bennett sees Kitty whored out on the street and parlays that into a job with Treadwell-Price?” She smiled. “That’s a top firm. A job there sets you up for life. I can totally see that weasel trying to work his sister’s tragedy to his own benefit.”

“Right.”

Evelyn sat back down in the chair. “But what does this have to do with Jane Delray? And why would Bennett lie about the ID? What does he gain from Lucy being dead? Oh!” She excitedly jabbed the pen in the air. “Insurance. I was looking at it from the wrong angle. Of course there’s no policy on Lucy. Bennett told us himself—his father’s dead, the mother’s just as good as, which leaves the estate and whatever policies the parents have to the children.” She sat up in the chair. “Maybe Bennett wanted to see Lucy in order to get her to sign away her claim to the estate. That happened with one of Bill’s clients last year. The old man was batty as a fruitcake. His children got him to sign away every last dime.”

“Hank Bennett certainly strikes me as an opportunist.”

“And besides, what would be the alternative?” Evelyn asked. “That Bennett killed Jane Delray? We saw him two days ago. His hands were perfectly clean. No cuts or bruises, which is exactly what you’d get if you attacked somebody.”

Amanda remembered the skin under Jane Delray’s fingernails. “She scratched her assailant. You would think he’d have a mark on the back of his hands or his neck or face.”

“Unless she scratched his arm. His chest. He was wearing a three-piece suit. Who knows what was under there?” Evelyn blew out a puff of air. “I don’t see Hank Bennett strangling a prostitute to death, then throwing her off the roof of Techwood Homes. Do you?”

Amanda didn’t know what the man was capable of. “I just get a bad feeling about him.”

“Me, too.”

They both stared at the wall. Amanda let her gaze wander, picking up different names out of order. She said, “Juice told me that Kitty was renting out her apartment to the other girls.”

“I guess she gets that entrepreneurial spirit from her father.”

“The next logical step would be to interrogate Andrew Treadwell and Hank Bennett.”

“Or, we could flap our hands and fly to the moon.”

“We should go back to Trey Callahan at the Union Mission. Juice said that he’s friends with the guy who runs the soup kitchen.”

Evelyn’s mouth dropped open in surprise. “Is it just me, or does everyone lie to us?”

“They lie to the men, too. No one tells you the truth if you have a badge.”

“Well, I suppose we should tell Betty Friedan we’ve finally achieved some parity.”

Amanda smiled.

“We should talk to the soup kitchen guy, too.”

“We still don’t know who Butch’s CI is. Someone at Techwood identified Jane Delray as Lucy Bennett.”

Evelyn took a clean sheet of paper out of her desk drawer. “Okay, first thing tomorrow: Union Mission, then the soup kitchen, then Techwood to show around the photographs of the girls. Do you think we could sneak a picture of Hank Bennett?” She tapped her pen on the desk. “I know a gal over at the driver’s license bureau. I bet we can get his photograph that way.”

Amanda looked at her friend. She was showing the same mixture of excitement and purpose that Amanda had felt all week. Something about working this case made them forget the danger involved. She said, “Two people warned me off this today.”

“Landry?”

“Three, then. Holly Scott and Deena Coolidge. They both told me that I was crazy to be doing this.”

Evelyn chewed her lip. She didn’t have to say that the women were right.

Amanda asked, “Are we really going to keep doing this?”

Evelyn stared back at her rather than respond. They both knew that they should stop. They both knew what was on the line. Not just their jobs. Their lives. Their futures. If they were fired from the police force, no one else would hire them. They would be pariahs.

“Girls!” Bill Mitchell called. “Supper’s on.”

Evelyn stood up. She squeezed Amanda’s hand. “Pretend it’s wonderful, whatever it is.”

Amanda didn’t know whether Evelyn was referring to Bill’s supper or the mess they were getting themselves into. Either way, she couldn't help but feel admiration as she followed the other woman into the hallway. Evelyn was either the most upbeat person the world had ever offered or the most delusional.

"Ladies." Kenny was standing beside the hi-fi with a record in his hands. "What's your pleasure?"

Evelyn smiled back at Amanda as she headed toward the kitchen, leaving her to answer the question.

Kenny suggested, "Skynyrd? Allman Brothers? Clapton?"

Amanda figured she might as well get this out of the way. "I'm sorry to say I'm more Sinatra."

"Do you know that I saw him at Madison Square Garden last year?" Kenny smiled at her surprise. "I flew up to New York just to see the show. I was three rows back. He came into the ring like a champ and belted on for hours." Kenny thumbed through the record collection. "Here you go. I let Bill borrow this six months ago. I doubt he's even looked at it." Kenny showed her the record sleeve. The Main Event—Live.

Bill called, "Dinner's getting cold."

Amanda waited for Kenny to put on the record. The overture played softly through the speakers. Kenny held out his arm and escorted her to the dining room. Evelyn was sitting in her husband's lap. He patted her bottom. She kissed him before getting up. "Amanda, the wine is lovely." She took a hefty sip from her glass. "You shouldn't have."

"I'm glad it's palatable. I had a feeling the man at the store was misleading me."

"I'm sure you're an excellent sommelier." Kenny pulled out a chair. Amanda sat down, letting her purse slide to the floor. Kenny's hand brushed across her shoulder before he sat down opposite his brother.

Amanda held her wineglass to her mouth as she exhaled a breath of air between her lips.

Bill asked, "What were you two gals up to? Should I be worried you're going to wallpaper the house with construction paper?"

"Maybe." Evelyn raised an eyebrow as she took another sip of wine. "We've got this case that's probably going to get us both fired."

"More time with my gal," Bill exclaimed. He hardly seemed worried as he stabbed a dry-looking piece of roast and put it on her plate. "Have you been mouthing off or making trouble?" He forked another piece of roast for Amanda. "Or both?"

Evelyn said, "We're likely going to get a black man out of jail."

Kenny laughed. "Making friends wherever you go."

"No kidding." Evelyn finished her glass of wine. "This particular fella is called Juice."

"Like the football player?" Bill topped off Amanda's glass, then refilled Evelyn's. "Rushed for seventeen hundred yards in '68."

"Seventeen hundred nine," Kenny corrected. "Ran 171 against Ohio State in the Rose Bowl."

"To football." Bill raised his glass.

"Hear, hear." Kenny followed suit. They clinked their glasses in a toast. Amanda felt a warmth spread through her body. She hadn't realized how tense she was until the wine made her relax.

Evelyn said, "The non-football Juice seems to have a crush on Amanda." She winked across the table. "Says she's a fine-lookin' woman."

"A very astute man." Kenny winked at Amanda, too. She took a large drink of wine to cover her embarrassment.

"He's a pimp," Evelyn said. "We met him at Techwood Homes last week."

Amanda felt her heart lurch in her chest, but Evelyn kept talking.

"He runs white women."

"My favorite kind." Bill refilled Amanda's glass. She hadn't realized she'd finished the first one already. Amanda looked down at the food on her plate. The vegetables had obviously been frozen. The meat was overcooked. Even the roll was burned around the edges.

"This prostitute, Jane—" Evelyn rolled her eyes. "Her apartment was not what you'd call tidy. What was it you said, Amanda? 'I'll look for back copies of Good Housekeeping'?"

The men laughed, and Evelyn continued the story. "She was an absolute terror to deal with."

Amanda sipped from her wineglass, which she kept pressed to her chest as she listened to Evelyn talk about the Techwood apartment, the mouthy whore. They all laughed when she mimicked Jane Delray's trashy accent. There was something about the way Evelyn told the story that made it sound funny instead of frightening. She could be relaying the plot of a television sitcom where two plucky gals stick their noses where they don't belong and end up escaping through wit and humor.

"Exit, stage left," Amanda said.

They all laughed, though Evelyn's smile wasn't quite as genuine. She tugged at the back of her hair.

Bill reached out and affectionately slapped away her hand. "You're going to snatch yourself bald."

Amanda asked, "Was it hard getting your hair cut?"

Evelyn shrugged. Obviously, it had been, but she said, "After Zeke, I didn't have time for it."

The wine had made Amanda brazen. She asked Bill, "Did you mind?"

He took Evelyn's hand. "Anything that makes my girl happy."

"I cried for at least an hour." Evelyn laughed, though her heart wasn't into it.

"I think it was closer to six," Bill said. "But I like it."

"It's very stylish," Kenny offered. "But long is nice, too."

Amanda patted the back of her hair. She was worse than Evelyn.

"Why don't you let it down?" The request came from Kenny. Amanda was both surprised and deeply embarrassed. She was also dangerously close to complete inebriation, which was probably why she complied with the request.

Amanda silently counted out the bobby pins as she pulled them from her hair. Five, six, seven. There were eight total, plus the hair spray, which made her fingers sticky as she ran them through her hair. It draped to the middle of her back. Amanda cut the ends once a year. She only kept it down in the winter, and then only at night when she was alone.

Evelyn sighed. "You're so pretty."

Amanda finished her wine. She was already dizzy. She should at least eat a dinner roll to absorb some of the alcohol, but she didn't want to hear the sound of her own chewing. The room was quiet except for the record playing. Sinatra singing "Autumn in New York."

Bill picked up the bottle and topped them off again. Amanda thought to cover the glass with her hand, but she couldn't make herself move.

The phone rang in the kitchen. Evelyn startled. "Gosh, who could be calling this late?"

Amanda couldn't be alone in the room like this. She followed Evelyn into the kitchen.

"Mitchell residence."

Amanda pulled back her hair, twisting it around the crown. She stuck the bobby pins back in. Her movements were clumsy. Too much wine. Too much attention.

"Where?" Evelyn asked. She pulled the long telephone cord across the room and got a pen and paper out of the drawer. "Say that again." She scribbled as she spoke. "And when was this?" She made some noises, encouraging the caller to continue. Finally, she said, "We'll be right there," and hung up.

"Right where?" Amanda asked. She kept her hand on the kitchen counter. The wine had pickled her brain. "Who was that?"

"Deena Coolidge." Evelyn folded the piece of paper in half. "They've just found another body."

Amanda felt her focus snap back. "Who?"

"They don't know yet. Blonde, thin, pretty."

"That sounds familiar."

"They found her at Techwood Homes." Evelyn pushed open the door to the dining room. "Sorry, boys, we need to step out."

Bill smiled. "You're just trying to get out of doing dishes."

"I'll do them in the morning."

They exchanged a look. Amanda realized that Bill Mitchell wasn't as naïve as she had first imagined. He saw through his wife's funny stories the same as Amanda.

He raised his glass in a toast. "I'll wait up for you, my love."

Evelyn grabbed Amanda's purse before letting the door swing closed. "I'm drunk as a lord," she muttered. "I hope I don't end up driving us into the creek."

"I'll drive." Amanda followed her out the kitchen door.

Instead of heading to the car, Evelyn went to the shed. The men had finished the job except for the painting. Evelyn ran her hand along the top of the door trim and found the key. She tugged on the chain to turn on the light. There was a safe bolted to the floor. Evelyn had to try the combination three times before she finally got it open. "I think we drank that whole bottle between us."

"Why did Deena call you?"

"I asked her to let me know if anything else came up." Evelyn pulled out her revolver. She checked there was ammunition in the cylinder, then snapped it back into place. She took out the speed-loader, then shut the safe door. "Let's go."

"Do you think you'll need that?"

Evelyn tucked the revolver into her purse. "I'm never going anywhere without it again." She grabbed the shelf as she stood up. Her eyes closed as she oriented herself. "They're probably going to give us both DUIs."

"That'll hardly make us stand out."

Evelyn pulled off the light and locked the door. Amanda took deep breaths of air as she walked to her car, trying to clear her head.

Evelyn said, "You know this means Juice didn't do it."

"Did we ever really think he did?"

"No, but now they'll know, too."

Amanda climbed into the car. She threw her purse into the back seat as she waited for Evelyn to get in. The drive to Techwood wasn't a long one, especially at eight o'clock in the evening. There was no traffic on the road. The only people who stayed in Atlanta after dark were the ones who had no business being there. Which was a good thing considering Amanda's state of intoxication. If she accidentally hit a pedestrian, no one was likely to care.

The traffic lights were flashing yellow as she traveled up Piedmont Road. Amanda took the steep curve that turned into Fourteenth Street, then slowed for the blinking light before turning left on Peachtree. Another right on North and she was following the same pattern they'd worn last week: past the Varsity, over the interstate, left on Techwood Drive, and straight into the hell of the projects.

Several police cruisers were blocking the path to their usual berm. Amanda parked behind a familiar Plymouth Fury. She glanced inside the car as she passed. Wadded-up packs of cigarettes. A half-empty bottle of Johnnie Walker. Crushed cans of beer. She followed Evelyn toward the buildings. Again, Rick Landry was standing in the middle of the courtyard. His hands were on his hips. His face twisted with anger when he saw Amanda and Evelyn.

"Whatta I gotta do, beat it into you broads?" He looked ready to do just that, but Deena Coolidge stopped him.

"Y'all ready?"

Landry glared at her. "Ain't nobody called for a pickaninny, Sapphire."

She puffed out her chest. "You need to get your cracker ass out my face before I pimp you up to Reggie."

Landry tried to stare her down, but Deena, who was at least a foot shorter than him, stood her ground. Landry finally relented, but not without mumbling "Cunts" as he stomped away.

Deena asked, "Y'all wondering what him and Butch are doing here when they're both on day shift? Because I sure am."

Amanda looked at Evelyn, who nodded. It did seem strange.

Deena said, "Pete's around back with the body, but I've got somebody for you to talk to first."

Neither of them spoke as they followed Deena into the building. The hall was packed with women and children dressed in housecoats and pajamas. Their faces were guarded and frightened. They had probably been settled down for the night when the police cars showed up. They'd all left their front doors open. The lights from the cruisers filled the apartments. Amanda was very conscious that hers and Evelyn's were the only white faces as Deena took them deeper into the building.

Only one apartment door on the floor was closed. Deena knocked on it. They waited for a chain to slide back, deadbolts to turn. The old woman who opened the door was dressed in a black skirt and jacket. Her white blouse was crisply starched. She was wearing a fine black hat with a short veil that hung to the top of her eyebrows.

“Whatchu doin’ dressed up for church, Miss Lula?” Deena asked. “I told you these gals just want to talk. They ain’t gonna drag you down to the jail.”

The old woman stared at the floor. She was cowed by their presence, that much was evident. Even when she stepped back so that they could enter, it was obvious that she was doing so under great duress. Amanda felt deeply ashamed as she walked into the apartment.

Deena suggested, “Why don’t you get us some tea, dear?”

Miss Lula nodded as she headed into the other room. Deena indicated the couch, which was a pale yellow and absolutely spotless. In fact, the living room was remarkably tidy. The one chair that faced the small television had a ruffled skirt and a doily. Magazines were neatly stacked on the table. The rug on the floor was clean. Pictures of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Jack Kennedy faced each other on the wall. There were no cobwebs in the corners. Even the stench of the building had not managed to permeate the space.

Still, neither Evelyn nor Amanda sat down. They were too mindful of the setting. As spotless as this woman’s apartment seemed, it was still surrounded by filth. You might as well drag a clean blanket through a mud puddle and expect it to remain unscathed.

They heard a kettle start to boil in the kitchen.

Deena’s tone was firm. “Y’all best both be sitting your white asses down by the time she comes back in here.”

Deena took the chair by the television. Reluctantly, Evelyn sat on the couch. Amanda joined her, keeping her purse clutched in her lap. Both of them sat on the edge of the cushions—not from fear of contamination, but because they were on duty. Years of wearing utility belts around their waists had made it impossible for them to sit back in their seats.

Amanda asked, “Who called in the body?”

Deena nodded toward the kitchen. “Miss Lula did. She’s been here since they integrated the place. They moved her over from Buttermilk.”

“Why does she think we’re going to arrest her?”

“Because you’re white and you have a badge.”

Evelyn mumbled, “That’s never impressed anybody before.”

Miss Lula was back. She had taken off her hat, revealing a shock of white hair. The china cups and saucers on her silver tray rattled as she brought the set into the living room. Instinctively, Amanda stood to help. The tray was heavy. She lowered it to the coffee table. Deena relinquished her chair to the old woman. It was a neat trick. Deena carefully smoothed down the back of her pants, probably checking for insects. A roach traveled across the wall behind her. Deena shuddered.

“Would you ladies like some cookies?” Miss Lula offered. Her voice was unexpectedly refined. There was almost the tinge of an English accent to it, like Lena Horne’s.

Evelyn answered, “Thank you, no. We’ve just had supper.” She reached toward the teapot. “May I?”

Miss Lula nodded. Amanda watched Evelyn pour four cups of tea. It was the strangest thing she’d ever been a part of. Amanda had never been a guest in a black person's home. Usually, the point of her visit was to get in and get out as quickly as possible. She felt as if she was in one of those Carol Burnett sketches that was trying for social commentary rather than humor.

Deena said, "Miss Lula used to be a teacher at the Negro school off Benson."

Amanda offered, "My mother was a teacher. Elementary school."

"That was my field as well," Miss Lula answered. She took the cup and saucer Evelyn offered. Her hands were old, the knuckles swollen. There was a slight ash tone. She pursed her lips and blew on the tea to cool it.

Evelyn served Deena next, then Amanda.

"Thank you." Amanda could feel the heat through the china, but she drank the scalding tea anyway, hoping the caffeine would help chase away the wine.

She looked up at the photos of Kennedy facing King, again taking in the orderly apartment that Miss Lula called home.

When Amanda had worked patrol, some of the men made a game of terrorizing these old people. They'd roll their cruisers up behind them in the street and purposefully backfire the car. Grocery bags were dropped. Hands flew into the air. Most of them would fall to the ground. The backfire sounded like a gunshot.

"Now." Deena had waited until they'd all had some tea. "Miss Lula, if you could tell these women what you told me?"

The old woman cast down her eyes again. She was obviously troubled. "I heard a commotion in the back."

Amanda realized the woman's apartment faced the rear of the complex. It was the same area where Jane Delray had been found three days ago.

Miss Lula continued, "I peered out the window and saw the girl just lying there. She had obviously passed." She shook her head. "Terrible sight. No matter their sins, no one deserves that."

Evelyn asked, "Was there anyone else back there?"

"Not as far as I could tell."

"Do you know what the noise was? The one that made you look out the window?"

"Perhaps it was the rear door banging open?" She didn't seem sure, though she nodded as if that was the only explanation that made sense.

Amanda asked, "Have you noticed anyone strange hanging around?"

"No more so than usual. Most of these girls had evening visitors. They generally came in through the back door."

That would make sense. None of the men probably wanted to be seen. Amanda asked, "Did you recognize the girl you saw out back?"

"She's from the top floor. I don't know her name. But I said from the beginning that they should not have been allowed to live here."

Deena supplied, "Because they're prostitutes, not because they're white."

Miss Lula said, "They were operating their business out of the apartment. That is contrary to the housing laws."

Evelyn put down her cup of tea. "Did you see any of their customers?"

"Occasionally. As I said, they mostly used the back door. Especially the white men."

"They saw both white and black men?"

"Frequently one after the other."

They were all silent as they considered the statement.

Evelyn asked, "How many women were living up there?"

"At first it was the young one. She said her name was Kitty. She seemed nice enough. She gave candy to some of the children, which was allowed until we realized what she was doing up there."

"And then?" Amanda asked.

"And then another woman moved in. This was at least a year and a half ago, mind you. The second girl was white, too. Looked very similar to Kitty. I never got her name. Her visitors were not as discreet."

"Is that the woman you saw through your window tonight? Kitty?"

"No, a third one. I've not seen Kitty in a while. Nor have I seen the second one in some time. These girls are very transitory." She paused, then added, "Lord help them. It's a difficult path they've chosen."

Amanda remembered the licenses she'd tucked into her purse. She unzipped her bag and pulled them out. "Do you recognize any of these girls?"

The old woman took the licenses. Her reading glasses were neatly folded on the side table, resting atop a well-read Bible. They all watched as she unfolded the glasses, slid them onto her face. Carefully, Miss Lula studied each license, giving each girl her undivided attention. "This one," she said, holding out the license for Kathryn Treadwell. "This is Kitty, but I assume you know that by her name."

Amanda said, "We've been led to believe that Kitty was renting out the space to other girls."

"Yes, that would make sense."

"Did you ever talk to her?"

"Once. She seemed to think very highly of herself. Apparently, her father is very politically connected."

"She said that to you?" Evelyn asked. "Kitty told you who her father was?"

"Not in so many words, but yes. She made it clear she didn't really belong here. But then, do any of us?"

Amanda couldn't answer the question. "Do the other girls look familiar?"

The woman scanned the license again. She held up Jane Delray's. "The quality of men changed quite a bit for this one. She was not as discriminating as—" She held up Mary Halston's photo. "This one had a lot of repeat customers, though I would not call them gentlemen. She's the girl out back." She read the name. "Donna Mary Halston. Such a pretty name considering the things she did."

Amanda heard Evelyn suck in her breath. They were both thinking of the same question. Amanda asked, "You said Mary had repeat business?"

"Yes, that's correct."

"Did you ever see a white man who was about six feet tall, sandy blond hair, long sideburns, wearing a sharply tailored suit, probably in some shade of blue?"

Miss Lula glanced at Deena. When she handed back the licenses to Amanda, her expression was blank. "I'll have to think on that. Let me get back to you tomorrow."

Amanda felt her brow furrow. Either the wine was wearing off or the tea was kicking in. Miss Lula's apartment was at the end of the hallway. It was at least ten yards from the stairwell, even farther from the back door. Unless the old woman spent her days sitting behind the building, there was no way she could note the comings and goings of the girls or their visitors.

Amanda opened her mouth to speak, but Deena interrupted her.

"Miss Lula," she said. "We appreciate your time. You've got my number. Get back to me on that question." She put her saucer down on the tray. When Evelyn and Amanda didn't move, she grabbed their teacups and placed them beside hers. "We can let ourselves out." She did everything but clap her hands to get them moving.

Amanda led the way, clutching her purse to her chest. She was going to turn to say goodbye, but Deena pushed them out the door.

The hallway had emptied. Still Amanda kept her voice low. "How could she —"

"Give her until tomorrow," Deena said. "She'll find out whether or not your mystery man was here."

"But how could she—"

"She's the queen bee," Deena told her, leading them up the hallway. She didn't stop until she reached the exit door. They stood in the same spot where Rick Landry had threatened Evelyn. "What Miss Lula told you isn't what she's seen. It's what she's heard."

"But she didn't—"

"Rule number one of the ghetto: find the oldest biddy been around the longest. She's the one running the place."

"Well," Evelyn said, "I did wonder why she had a shotgun under the couch."

Amanda asked, "What?"

"That thing was loaded, too." Deena pushed open the door.

The crime scene was cordoned off with yellow tape. There were no lights back here, or at least no lights that were functioning. The bulbs on the light poles had all been broken, probably with rocks. Six patrolmen took care of the problem. They stood in a ring around the body, the butts of their Kel-Lites resting on their shoulders to illuminate the area.

The grounds behind the building were as desolate as the front. Red Georgia clay was packed hard by the constant pounding of bare feet. There were no flowers back here. No grass. One lone tree stood with its tired branches hanging down. Just below the tree was the body. Pete Hanson blocked the view with his wide frame. Beside him was a young man of about the same height and stature. Like Pete, he was wearing a white lab coat. He tapped Pete on the shoulder and nodded toward the women.

Pete stood up. He had a grim look on his face. "Detectives. I'm glad you're here, though I say that with reservations given the circumstances." He indicated the young man. "This is one of my pupils, Dr. Ned Taylor."

Taylor gave them a stern nod. Even in the low illumination, Amanda could see the green tint to his skin. He looked as if he might be ill. Evelyn wasn't much better.

Deena suggested, "Pete, why don't you run Amanda through this?"

Amanda supposed she should feel proud of her lack of squeamishness, but it was starting to feel like one more secret she would have to keep about herself.

Evelyn volunteered, "I'll go check the apartment. Maybe Butch and Landry missed something."

Deena harrumphed. "I'd bet my next paycheck on it."

"This way, my dear." Pete cupped his hand beneath Amanda's elbow as he led her toward the dead woman. The six officers holding flashlights seemed puzzled that Amanda was there, though none of them asked questions, probably in deference to Pete.

"If you would?" Pete got down on one knee, then helped Amanda kneel beside him. She smoothed down her skirt so that her knees would not grind against the dirt. Her heels were going to get scuffed. She hadn't exactly dressed for this.

Pete said, "Tell me what you see."

The victim was face down. Her long blonde hair draped down her shoulders and back. She was wearing a black miniskirt and red T-shirt. Her hand rested on the ground a few inches from her face. The nails were polished bright red.

Amanda said, "Same as the other victim. All ten fingernails expertly manicured."

"Correct." Pete pulled back the woman's stringy blonde hair. "Neck's bruised, though I'm going to guess the hyoid wasn't broken."

"She wasn't strangled to death?"

"I believe there's something else going on." He pulled up the red T-shirt. There was a line of injuries down the woman's side, almost like a dress seam had been ripped open. "These lacerations run the length of her body."

Amanda saw the pattern duplicated on the girl's leg. She had mistaken the damage for the seam in a pair of stockings. Likewise, the outside of the victim's arms showed the marks. It was like a McCall's pattern, where someone had tried to tear apart the stitches joining the front to the back of her body.

Amanda asked, "What—who—would do that?"

"Two very good questions. Unfortunately, my answer to both is that I have no idea."

Amanda didn't so much ask as wonder aloud, "You told Deena to call us, to get us here."

"Yes. The manicured fingernails were similar. The setting. I thought there was more, but upon further examination ..." He started to pull up the miniskirt, then changed his mind. "I must warn you, even I was startled. I haven't seen this in a few years."

Amanda shook her head. "What do you mean?"

He pulled up the skirt. There was a knitting needle between the girl's legs.

Amanda didn't need to be coached this time. Automatically, she found herself taking deep breaths, filling her lungs, then slowly pushing out all the air.

Pete shook his head. "There's absolutely no reason for a girl to have to do this anymore."

Amanda noticed, "There's no blood."

Pete sat back on his heels. "No, there's not."

"You would expect to see blood, wouldn't you? From the knitting needle?"

"Yes." Pete pushed open the legs. One of the officers moved back a step. He nearly tripped over a broken tree limb. There were a couple of nervous laughs, but the man righted himself without incident. He trained the beam of his flashlight on the victim's legs.

Pasty white thighs. No blood.

Amanda asked, "Are her fingerprints on the knitting needle?"

Despite the circumstances, Pete smiled at her. "None. It was wiped clean."

"She didn't do this to herself."

"Not likely. She's been cleaned up. Someone brought her here."

"The same place our other victim was found."

"Not exactly, but close." He pointed to a spot several feet away. "Lucy Bennett was found over there."

Amanda looked back up at the building. Miss Lula's apartment was on the far end. She couldn't see the tree from her window. She certainly couldn't see where Jane Delray was found. Deena was right. There was someone else—or a series of someone elses—who'd seen everything but were too afraid to tell.

"Ned," Pete called. "Take her feet, I'll get her shoulders."

The young doctor did as he was instructed. Carefully, they rolled the victim over onto her back.

Amanda looked at the girl's face. The damage was incomprehensible. Her eyelids were shredded. Her mouth was torn to pieces. Still, there was enough left to recognize her. Amanda unzipped her purse and found the license, which she handed to Pete.

"Donna Mary Halston," he read. "Lives here?" He looked up at the building. "Top floor, I'm assuming. Same as Lucy Bennett."

Amanda shuffled through the licenses and found Lucy Bennett's. She handed this to Pete and waited.

"Hm." He studied the photo carefully. He was obviously mindful of the six patrolmen when he told Amanda, "This girl is unfamiliar to me."

Amanda handed him Jane Delray's license.

Again, he studied the photo. A deep sigh came out like a groan. "Yes, this one I recognize." He handed both licenses back to Amanda. "Now what?"

She shook her head. It felt good to have Pete weigh in on the identities, but his validation wasn't going to change much.

The back door opened. Evelyn shook her head. "Nothing in the apartment. It's still a mess, but I don't think anyone's—" She stopped. Amanda followed her gaze to the knitting needle. Evelyn put her hand to her mouth. Instead of turning away, she looked up at the tree. Then she looked down at the girl again.

"What is it?" Amanda asked. Something was obviously wrong. She stood up and joined Evelyn. It was the same as the construction paper puzzle. Sometimes a change in perspective was all it took.

The tree limb was broken. The girl lay on the ground. Her child had been aborted.

"Oh, my God." Amanda realized, "Ophelia."

Present Day

SUZANNA FORD

The darkness. The cold. The noise.

Air sucking in and out, like a car zooming through a tunnel.

She couldn't take it anymore. Her body ached. Her mouth was dry. Her stomach was so empty that she felt as if the acids were eating a hole in her belly.

Meth.

That was what had brought her here. Brought her low. She had fallen too far. She had put herself in the gutter. She had brought herself to this place.

Dear Jesus, she prayed. If you get me out of here, I will worship You every day. I will exalt Your name.

The claustrophobia. The absolute darkness. The unknowing. The fear of suffocation.

Way back when they were still a family, her father had taken them all on a trip to Wales. There was a mine there, something from thousands of years ago. You had to wear a hard hat to go into the tunnels. They were small because people weren't as tall back then. They were narrow because most of the workers were children.

Suzanna had gone in twenty feet before she started freaking out. She could still see sunlight from the opening, but she'd nearly pissed herself running back toward the entrance.

That was what it felt like now. Trapped. Hopeless.

I will praise You. I will spread Your word. I will humble myself before You.

Arms couldn't move. Legs couldn't move. Eyes couldn't open. Mouth couldn't open.

Meth will never touch my lips, my nose, my lungs, ever again, so help me God.

The tremble started slow, coursing through her body, straining her muscles. Her fingers flexed into a fist. She clenched her shoulders, her teeth, her ass. The threads pulled. The pain was excruciating. Hot needles touching raw nerves. Her heart was going to explode in her chest. She could rip herself away. She was stronger than this. She could rip herself away.

Suzanna tried. She tried so hard. But each time, the pain won.

She couldn't make the skin tear. She couldn't make the thread break.

She could only lie there.

Praying for salvation.

Dear Jesus—

Present Day

TUESDAY

Will awoke with a start. His neck cracked as he stretched it side to side. He was at home, sitting on his couch. Betty was beside him. The little dog was on her back. Legs up. Nose pointed toward the front door. Will glanced around, looking for Faith. She'd driven him home from the morgue. She'd gone to get him a glass of water and now, judging by the clock on the TiVo, it was almost two hours later.

He listened to the house. It was quiet. Faith had left. Will didn't know how he felt about that. Should he be relieved? Should he wonder where she had gone? There was no guidebook for this part of his life. No instructions he could follow to put it all back together.

He tried to close his eyes again, to go back to sleep. He wanted to wake up a year from now. He wanted to wake up and have all of this over.

Only, he couldn't get his eyes to stay closed. Every time he tried, he found himself staring back up at the ceiling. Was that what it had been like for his mother? According to the autopsy report, her eyes had not always been sewn closed. Sometimes, they had been sewn open. The medical examiner posited in the report that Will's father would have to stay close by during these periods. He would have to use a dropper to keep her eyes from drying out.

Dr. Edward Taylor. That was the name of the medical examiner. The man had died in a car accident fifteen years ago. He'd been the first investigator Will had tried to track down. The first dead end. The first time Will had felt relief that there was no one around to explain to him exactly what had happened to his mother.

"Hey." Faith came out of his spare bedroom. He could see that the light was still on. His books were in there. All his CDs. Car magazines he'd collected over the years. Albums from way back. It had probably taken Faith less than ten seconds to figure out which items were most out of place. She held the books in her hand. The New Feminist Hegemony. Applied Statistical Models: Theory and Application. A Vindication of the Rights of Women.

He said, "You can go home now."

"I'm not leaving you alone." She put his mother's textbooks on the table as she sat in the recliner. The file was on the table, too. Will had left it there this morning. Faith had probably paged through everything while he was sleeping. He should've felt angry that she'd been prying, but there was nothing left inside of him. Will was utterly devoid of any emotion. He'd felt it happen when he first saw Sara at the morgue. His initial impulse was to weep at her feet. To tell her everything. To beg her to understand.

And then—nothing.

It was like a stopper being pulled. All of the feeling had just drained out of him.

The rest flashed in his mind like a movie preview that gave away every plot twist: The battered girl. The painted fingernails. The ripped skin. The sound of Sara's breath catching when Will told her—told everyone—that his father was to blame.

Sara was a verbal woman, outspoken at times, and not usually one to hold back her opinion. But in the end, she'd said nothing. After nearly two weeks of living with that inquisitive look in her eyes, there were no questions she wanted to ask. Nothing she wanted to know. It was all laid out in front of her. Amanda was right about the autopsy. Will shouldn't have been there. It had been like watching his mother being examined, processed, catalogued.

And Angie was right about Sara. It was too much for her to handle.

Why had he thought for even a second that Angie was wrong? Why had he thought Sara would be different?

Will had just stood there in the morgue, frozen in time and place. Staring at Sara. Waiting for her to speak. Waiting for her to scream or yell or throw something. He would probably still be there but for Amanda ordering Faith to take him home. Even then, Faith had to grab Will's arm and physically pull him from the room.

Close-up on Sara. Her face pale. Her head shaking. Fade to black.

The end.

"Will?" Faith asked.

He looked up at her.

"How did you get into the GBI?"

He weighed the question, trying to spot her end game. "I was recruited."

"How?"

"Amanda came to my college."

Faith gave a tight nod, and he could tell she was chasing a train of thought he couldn't pin down. "What about the application?"

Will rubbed his eyes. There was still white grit in the corners from tearing apart the basement.

Faith pressed, "The background screening. All the paperwork."

She knew about his dyslexia. She also knew he could pull his own weight. "It was mostly oral interviews. They let me take the rest home. Same as you, right?"

Faith's chin tilted up. Finally, she said, "Right."

Will rested his hand on Betty's chest. He could feel her heart beat against his palm. She sighed. Her tongue licked out.

Will asked, "Why did the reporter from The Atlanta Journal call Amanda?"

Faith shrugged. "Don't worry about it. I told you I shut down the story."

Will had been so blind. Amanda had fed him the information this morning but he'd been too exhausted to process it. "My records are sealed. There's no way a reporter—or anybody—could know who my father is. At least not legally." He studied Faith. "And even if someone found out, why call Amanda? Why not call me directly? My number is listed. So's my address."

Faith chewed her bottom lip. It was her tell. She knew something that Will did not, and she wasn't going to share it.

Will leaned toward her. "I want you to go to the hotel. He's on parole. He doesn't have a legal expectation of privacy."

Faith didn't need to ask whose hotel room. "And do what?"

Will clenched his fist. The cuts opened up again. "I want you to toss his room. I want you to interrogate him and sit on him until he can't take it anymore."

Faith stared at him. "You know I can't do that."

"Why not?"

"Because we have to build a case, not a harassment suit."

"I don't care about a case. Make him so miserable he leaves the hotel just to get away from you."

"And then what?"

She knew what would happen next. Will would shoot him down in the street like a rabid dog.

She said, "I'm not going to do that."

"I can look up the layout of the hotel. I can go to the courthouse. I can find a way in there and—"

"That sounds like a great way to leave a paper trail."

Will didn't care about a paper trail. "How many men are on the hotel?"

"Five times as many as are sitting outside your house right now."

Will went to the front window. He pushed open the blinds. There was an Atlanta cop car blocking his driveway. A G-ride was in the street. Will slammed his hand against the blinds. Betty barked, jumping up from the couch.

He went to the back of the house. He opened the kitchen door. A man was sitting in the gazebo Will had built last summer. Tan and blue GBI regs. Glock on his hip. He had his feet propped up on the railing. He waved as Will slammed the door.

"She can't do this," Will said. "She can't sit on my house like I'm some kind of criminal."

Faith asked, "Why didn't you ever tell me about him?"

Will paced across the room. His body was suddenly filled with adrenaline. "So I can be another notch in your serial killer collection?"

"Do you really think I'd turn your life into a game?"

"Where's my gun?" His keys were on his desk. His phone. The Glock was missing. "Did you take my gun?"

Faith didn't answer, but he noticed that her thigh holster was gone. She'd locked her gun in the car. She didn't trust him not to take it.

Several thoughts came into Will's head. Punching a hole in the wall. Kicking over his desk. Breaking the windows in Faith's car. Taking a bat to that asshole sitting in his gazebo. In the end, Will could only stand there. It was the same thing that had happened at the morgue. He was too exhausted. Too overwhelmed. Too handled. "Just leave, Faith. I don't need you babysitting me. I don't want you here."

"Too bad."

"Go home. Go home to your stupid kid and get the hell out of my business."

"If you think being a dick is going to chase me away, you don't know me very well." She sat back in the chair, arms crossed over her chest. "Sara found semen in the girl's hair."

Will waited for her to continue.

"There's enough for a DNA profile. Once it's in the system, we can match it against his."

"That'll take weeks."

"Four days," she told him. "Dr. Coolidge put a rush on it."

"Then arrest him. You can hold him for twenty-four hours."

"Which means he'll bail out and disappear before we can pick him up again."

Her voice had the annoying tone of someone trying to be reasonable. "APD put six guys on the hotel. Amanda probably has ten more. He won't be able to take a shit without us knowing."

"I want to be there when you arrest him."

"You know Amanda won't allow that."

"When you interrogate him." Will couldn't help himself. He started begging. "Please let me see him. Please. I have to see him. I have to look him in the eye. I want to see his face when he realizes that I got away. That he didn't win."

Faith put her hand over her heart. "I swear to God, Will. I swear to you on the lives of my children that I will do everything in my power to make sure that happens."

"It's not enough," Will said. He didn't just want to look his father in the eye. He wanted to beat him. He wanted to kick out his teeth. To slice off his cock. To sew shut his mouth and eyes and nose and beat him until he drowned in his own vomit. "It's not enough."

"I know it's not," Faith said. "It'll never be enough, but it'll have to do."

There was a knock on the door. Will didn't know who he was expecting when Faith opened the door. Amanda. Angie. Some cop telling him that Will's father had killed again.

Anyone but the person who was actually there.

Sara asked Faith, "Everything okay?"

Faith nodded, picking up her purse by the door. She told Will, "I'll call you the minute I know anything. I promise."

Sara shut the door behind her. Her hair fell in soft curls around her shoulders. She was wearing a tight black dress that wrapped around her body. Will had seen her dressed up before, but never like this. She was wearing extremely high heels with a black leopard print. They did something to her calf that sent a tightness into his groin.

She said, "Hi."

Will swallowed. He could still taste plaster in his throat.

Sara walked around the couch and sat down. She slid off her heels and tucked her legs underneath her. "Come here."

Will sat down on the couch. Betty was between them. She jumped down. Her toenails clicked across the floor as she headed into the kitchen.

Sara took his hand. She must've noticed the cuts and blisters, but she didn't say anything. Will couldn't look at her. She was so beautiful that it was almost painful. Instead, he stared at the coffee table. His mother's file. Her books.

He said, "I guess Amanda told you everything."

"No, she didn't."

Will wasn't surprised. Amanda loved torturing him. He pointed to his mother's things. "If you want to—" Will stopped, trying to keep his voice from cracking. "It's all there. Just go ahead and read it."

Sara glanced down at the file, but said, "I don't want to read it."

Will shook his head. He didn't understand.

"You tell me about her when you're ready."

"It would be easier if—"

She reached out to touch his face. Her fingers stroked his cheek. She moved closer. He felt the heat of her body as she pressed against him. Will put his hand on her leg, felt the firm muscle of her thigh. The tightness came back. He kissed her. Sara's hands went to his face as she kissed him back. She straddled him. Her hair draped across his face. He could feel her breath on his neck.

Unfortunately, that was the extent of his feelings.

She asked, "Do you want me to—"

"No." He pulled her back up. "I'm sorry. I'm—"

She put her fingers to his lips. "You know what I really want to do?" She climbed off him, but stayed close. "I want to watch a movie where robots hit each other. Or things blow up. Preferably from robots hitting each other." She picked up the remote and turned on the set. She tuned in the Speed channel. "Oh, look. This is even better."

Will could not think of a time in his life when he'd felt more miserable. If Faith had not taken his Glock, he would've shot himself in the head. "Sara, it's not—"

"Shh." Sara took his arm and wrapped it around her shoulder. She rested her head on his chest, her hand on his leg. Betty came back. She jumped into Will's lap and settled in.

He stared at the television. The Ferrari Enzo was being profiled. An Italian man was using a lathe to hollow out a piece of aluminum. Nothing the announcer said would stay in Will's head. He felt his eyelids getting heavy. He let out a slow breath.

Finally, his eyes stayed closed.

This time, when Will woke up, he wasn't alone. Sara was lying on the couch in front of him. Her back curved into his body. Her hair tickled his face. The room was dark except for the glow of the television set. The sound was muted. Speed was showing a monster-truck rally. The TiVo read twelve past midnight.

Another day passed. Another night come. Another page turned in the calendar of his father's life.

Will couldn't stop the thoughts that came into his head. He wondered if Faith still had his Glock. He wondered whether the patrol car was still blocking his driveway or the asshole was still in his gazebo.

He had a Sig Sauer in the gun safe that was bolted inside his closet. His Colt AR-15 rifle was disassembled beside it. Ammunition for both was stacked in a plastic box. Will worked the rifle in his mind—magazine, bolt catch, trigger guard. Winchester 55-grain full metal jacket.

No. The Sig would be better. Closer. Muzzle to the head. Finger on the trigger. Will would see the terror in his father's eyes, then the glassy, vacant stare of a dead man.

Sara stirred. Her hand snaked back and stroked the side of his face. Her fingerprints lightly scratched the skin. She breathed a contented sigh.

Just like that, Will felt the anger start to drain away. Again, it was similar to what had happened at the morgue, but instead of feeling empty, he felt full. A calmness took over. The clamp around his chest started to loosen.

Sara leaned back into him. Her hand pulled him closer. Will's body was much more responsive this time. He pressed his mouth to her neck. The fine hairs stood at attention. He could feel her flesh prickle under his tongue.

Sara turned her head to look at him. She gave a sleepy smile. "Hey."
"Hey."

"I was hoping that was you."

He kissed her mouth. She turned to face him. She was still smiling. Will could feel the curve of her lips against his mouth. Her hair was tangled underneath her. He shifted and felt a sharp pain in his leg. It wasn't a pulled muscle. It was Angie's ring. He still had it in his pocket.

Sara mistook his reaction for a recurrence of his earlier problem. She said, "Let's play a game."

Will didn't need a game. He needed to get Angie out of his head, but that wasn't exactly news he could share.

She held out her hand. "I'm Sara."

"I know."

"No." She still had her hand out. "I'm Sara Linton."

And apparently, Will was a moron. He shook her hand. "Will Trent."

"What do you do for a living, Will Trent?"

"I'm a ..." He glanced around for an idea. "I'm a monster-truck driver."

She looked at the TV and laughed. "That's creative."

"What are you?"

"A stripper." She laughed again, as if she'd shocked herself. "I'm only doing it to pay my way through college."

If Will's stupid wedding ring wasn't in his front pocket, he could've invited Sara to slip her hand inside to get some money for a lap dance. Instead, he had to settle on telling her, "That's commendable." He shifted onto his side, freeing up his hand. "What are you studying?"

"Umm ..." She grinned. "Monster-truck repair."

He trailed his finger between her breasts. The dress was low-cut, designed in such a way that it opened with little effort. Will realized she had worn it for him. Just like she'd let her hair down. Just like she'd squeezed her feet into a pair of high-heel shoes that could probably break her toes.

Just like she'd been at the autopsy. Just like she was here now.

He said, "I'm actually not a monster-truck driver."

"No?" Her breath caught as he tickled his fingers down her bare stomach.
"What are you?"

"I'm an ex-con."

"Oh, I like that," she said. "Jewel thief or bank robber?"

"Petty theft. Destruction of private property. Four-year suspended sentence."

Her laughter stopped. She could tell he wasn't playing anymore.

Will took in a deep breath and slowly let it go. He was doing this now. There was no going back. "I was arrested for stealing food." He had to clear his throat so the words could get out. "It happened when I was eighteen."

She put her hand over his.

"I aged out of the system." Mrs. Flannigan had died the summer Will's eighteenth birthday rolled around. The new guy who ran the home had given Will a hundred dollars and a map to the homeless shelter. "I ended up at the downtown mission. Some of the guys there were all right. Most of them were older and—" He didn't finish the sentence. Sara could easily guess why a teenager didn't feel safe there. "I lived on the streets ..." Again, he let his voice trail off. "I hung out at the hardware store on Highland. Contractors used to go there in the mornings to pick up day workers."

She used her thumb to stroke the back of his hand. "Is that where you learned how to fix things?"

"Yeah." He'd never really thought about it, but it was true. "I made good money, but I didn't know how to spend it. I should've saved up for an apartment. Or a car. Or something. But I spent it on candy and a Walkman and tapes." Will had never had money in his pocket before. There was no such thing as an allowance when he was growing up. "I was sleeping on Peachtree where the library used to be. This group of older guys rolled me. They beat me down. Broke my nose, some of my fingers. Took everything I had. I guess I'm lucky that's all they did."

Sara's grip tightened around his hand.

"I couldn't work. My clothes were filthy. I didn't have anywhere to bathe. I tried to beg for money but people were scared of me. I guess I looked like a junkie." He told Sara, "I wasn't, though. I never did drugs. I never did any of those things."

She nodded.

"But I was so hungry. My stomach hurt all the time. I was dizzy from it. Sick. Afraid to go to sleep. Afraid I'd get rolled again. I went into this all-night pharmacy that used to be on Ponce de Leon. Plaza Drugs, right beside the movie theater?" Sara nodded. "I walked straight in and started taking food off the shelves. Little Debbies. Moon Pies. Anything with a wrapper. I tore it open with my teeth and shoved it into my mouth." He swallowed, his throat feeling raw. "They called the cops."

"They arrested you?"

"They tried." He felt shame welling up in his throat. "I started swinging my fists, trying to hit anything. They stopped me real fast."

Sara stroked back his hair with her fingers.

"They handcuffed me. Took me to jail. And then—" He shook his head. "My caseworker came in. I hadn't seen her in six, maybe seven months. She said she'd been looking for me."

"Why?"

"Because Mrs. Flannigan left me some money." Will still remembered his shock when he heard the news. "I was only allowed to use it for college. So—" He shrugged. "I went to the first college that would take me. Lived in the dorm. Ate in the cafeteria. Worked a part-time job on the grounds. And then I got recruited into the GBI, and that was it."

Sara was quiet, probably trying to absorb it all. "How did you pass the background check?"

"The judge said she would expunge my record if I graduated from college."

Fortunately, the woman hadn't specified anything about his grades. "So I did and she did."

Sara was quiet again.

"I know it's bad." He laughed at the irony. "I guess in the scheme of things, it's not the worst thing you've heard about me today."

"You were lucky you got arrested."

"I guess."

"And I'm lucky that you got into the GBI, because I never would've met you otherwise."

"I'm sorry, Sara. I'm sorry I brought all this down on you. I don't—" He felt the words getting jumbled up in his mouth. "I don't want you to be scared of me. I don't want you to think that I'm anything like him."

"Of course you're not." She wrapped her hand around his. "Don't you know that I'm in awe of you?"

Will could only look at her.

"What you've been through. What you've endured. The man you've become." She placed his hand over her heart. "You chose to be a good person. You chose to help other people. It would've been so easy to go down the wrong path, but at every step, you chose to do the right thing."

"Not always."

"Often enough," she said. "Often enough so that when I look at you, all I can think about is how good you are. How much I want you—need you—in my life."

Her eyes were a clear green in the glow of the television. Will couldn't believe that she was still there beside him. Still wanted to be with him. Angie had been so wrong. There was no guile inside of Sara. No meanness. No spite.

If he were truly a good man, he would've told Sara about Angie. He would've confessed and gotten it over with. Instead, Will kissed her. He kissed her eyelids and her nose and her mouth. Their tongues touched. Will moved on top of her. Sara's leg wrapped around his. She deepened the kiss. Will felt the guilt slip away easily—too easily. All that he could think about was his desire, his need to be inside of her. He felt almost frantic as he started to undress her.

Sara helped him with her clothes. He ended up tearing the dress. She was wearing a lacy black bra that easily unclasped. Will kissed her breasts, used his tongue and teeth until she let out a deep moan. He traced his tongue down, biting and kissing the smooth skin. Sara gasped when he pulled down her underwear and pushed apart her legs. She tasted like honey and copper pennies. Her thigh rubbed against his face. Her fingernails dug into his scalp. She pulled him back up and started kissing him again. Sucking his tongue. Doing things with her mouth that made him start to shake. Will pushed himself inside of her. She moaned again. She gripped his back. Will forced himself to go slow. Sara took him in deeper with each thrust.

Her lips brushed his ear. "My love," she breathed. "My love."

July 15, 1975

LUCY BENNETT

The contractions started with the sunrise. He'd cut open her eyes, but not her mouth. Lucy could feel the thread tugging her lips as she groaned from the pain.

Her arms and legs were spread open, her body aligned straight down the center of the mattress. She had already ripped away her right shoulder. Just a few inches, but it was enough. The shock of being able to move had at first dulled the pain. Now, the flesh throbbed. Blood trickled down her arm and chest, pooled beneath her shoulder blade.

Another contraction started to build. Slow, slow, slow and then it erupted and Lucy felt her lips start to tear apart as she screamed in agony.

"Shut up," someone hissed.

The girl in the room next door.

She had spoken.

The floor creaked beneath her feet as she walked to the closed door.

"Shut up," she repeated.

The other girl had learned. She was compliant. She was welcoming. She talked to the man. Prayed with him. Screamed and thrashed and grunted with him. In a child's voice, she suggested he do things that Lucy had not even considered.

And for that, he let her off her leash sometimes.

Like now.

She was talking. Walking. Moving around.

She could leave at any time. Run to get help. Run to the police or her family or anywhere but here.

But she didn't. The other girl was a regular Patty Hearst.

Lucy's replacement.

July 15, 1975

Amanda sat in a back booth at the Majestic Diner on Ponce de Leon. She stifled a yawn. After leaving Techwood last night, she was too wired to asleep. Even Mary Wollstonecraft couldn't send her off. She'd tossed and turned, images of the construction paper puzzle seemingly burned into her retinas. She'd added the new details in her mind: Hank Bennett—liar. Trey Callahan—liar.

And Ophelia. What to make of Ophelia?

The waitress refilled Amanda's cup. She looked at her watch. Evelyn was fifteen minutes late, which was troubling. Amanda had never known her to be tardy. She'd used the pay phone in the back to call the Model City precinct, but no one had answered the phone. Amanda's own roll call had ended almost half an hour ago. She was assigned to Vanessa today, which suited them both. The other woman had decided to treat herself to a day of shopping. That new credit card was burning a hole in her pocketbook.

The door opened and Evelyn rushed in. "Sorry," she apologized. "I had the strangest call from Hodge."

"My Hodge?"

Evelyn waved away the waitress who came to take her order. "He had dispatch send me to Zone One."

"Did anyone see you?"

"No, the station was empty. It was just me and Hodge and his open door." She sat back against the booth. She was obviously flustered. "He wanted me to tell him everything we've been doing."

Amanda felt panic start to build.

"It's okay. He wasn't mad. At least, I don't think he was mad. Who knows with that man? You're absolutely right about his inscrutability. It's unnerving."

"Did he say anything?"

"Nothing. No criticisms. No comments. He just nodded and then told me to go do my job."

"That's the same thing he told me yesterday. To do my job." Amanda asked, "Do you think he was comparing our stories?"

"Could be."

"You didn't hold anything back?"

"Well, I kept Deena's name out of it. And Miss Lula's. I didn't want either of them getting into trouble."

"You told him about Ophelia?"

"No," she admitted. "I told him we were going to circle back on Trey Callahan, but I didn't tell him why. Luther Hodge doesn't strike me as a devotee of William Shakespeare."

"I don't know about that myself, Evelyn. Maybe we're leaping to conclusions.

Trey Callahan quotes a line from Hamlet and then you and I see the victim last night and fill in the blanks. It smacks of too much coincidence.”

“Is there really such a thing as coincidence in police work?”

Amanda couldn’t answer her. “Do you think Hodge will make trouble for us?”

“Who the hell knows?” She threw her hands into the air. “We should get to the mission. Going over it with Hodge again made me think of some things.”

Amanda slid out of the booth. She left two quarters on the table for the coffee and a generous tip. “Like what?”

“Like, everything.” Evelyn waited until they were outside to speak. “This Hank Bennett situation. I think you’re right. I think he’s a snake in the grass, and he used the information he had about Kitty Treadwell to get a job with her father.”

They got into Amanda’s car. She asked, “How would Bennett know there was a relation?”

“Her name was on the apartment door,” Evelyn reminded her. “Even without that, Kitty had a big mouth about her father. Miss Lula knew she was politically connected. Juice knew, too—he even mentioned another sister who was the golden child. It was an open secret on the street.”

“But not higher up the social ladder,” Amanda assumed. “Andrew Treadwell’s a Georgia graduate. I remember reading that in the newspaper.”

Evelyn smiled. “Hank Bennett was wearing a UGA class ring.”

“Georgia Bulldogs, class of 1974.” Once again, Amanda pulled out onto Ponce de Leon Avenue. “They could’ve met at a mixer or a social. All those frat boys are thick as thieves.” She’d interviewed her share for the sex crimes unit. They lied like carpets.

“What’s going on there?” Evelyn pointed at the Union Mission. An APD squad car blocked the entrance.

“I have no idea.” Amanda pulled onto the sidewalk and got out of the car. She recognized the patrolman walking out of the building, though she didn’t know his name. He obviously knew both Amanda and Evelyn. His pace quickened as he headed toward his car.

“Excuse me—” Amanda tried, but it was too late. The man got into his cruiser. Rubber squealed against asphalt as he peeled off.

“And the beat goes on,” Evelyn said. She didn’t seem too daunted as she headed toward the mission entrance. Instead of finding Trey Callahan, they saw a pudgy older man wearing a priest’s collar. He was sweeping broken glass off the floor. The front window had been broken. A brick was among the shards.

“Yes?” he asked.

Evelyn took the lead. “We’re with the Atlanta Police Department. We’re looking for Trey Callahan.”

The man seemed confused. “So am I.”

Amanda gathered they’d missed something. “Callahan isn’t here?”

“Who do you think caused this mess?” He indicated the broken glass. “Trey was supposed to open the shelter last night. He didn’t show up, so one of the girls threw a brick through the window.” He leaned against the broom. “I’m sorry, I’ve never dealt with the police before. Are you gals secretaries? The officer who just left said he would need a typed statement.”

Amanda suppressed a groan. The officer had been giving him the runaround. “We’re not secretaries. We’re plainclothes—”

"Detectives," Evelyn interrupted, sounding very sure of herself. "And we don't type statements. What's your name, sir?"

"Father Bailey. I work at the soup kitchen down the street."

He didn't match the descriptions they'd been given. The priest was only a few inches taller than Amanda. "Are you the only one who works at the kitchen?"

"No, my associate does the cooking. Sometimes, I help with the cleaning, but my main duties are to provide spiritual support." He glanced at the clock on the wall. "I'm actually late, so if you girls—"

Evelyn interrupted, "If you work at the soup kitchen, why are you here?"

"I was supposed to meet with Trey this morning. We coordinate once a month, talk about the girls, who might be in trouble, who to look out for."

"And you pulled in and saw the broken window?"

"And a room full of girls sleeping away the morning when they should've been locked out of the building." He indicated the back of the room. "Trey's office has been rifled. Probably one of the girls."

"Did any of them see anything?"

"I hate to be uncharitable, but none of them are particularly helpful unless it directly benefits themselves."

Amanda remembered, "What about Callahan's girlfriend? She's training to be a nurse at Georgia Baptist."

He studied her for a moment. "Yes, I called over there looking for her. Eileen Sapperson. They say she missed her shift last night, too."

"Did the hospital have a home number for her?"

"She doesn't have a home line."

"Do you mind if we—" Amanda indicated Callahan's office. The priest shrugged. He resumed sweeping as they walked to the back of the room.

The office had clearly been tossed, but Amanda wasn't sure whether the perpetrator was a junkie looking for money or a man trying to quickly leave town. Callahan's desk was cleared of all his personal items. No framed photo of his dog and girlfriend. No Slinky. No funk posters. No transistor radio. There were a few joints smoked down to the last centimeter in the ashtray. The drawers hung open. Most important, the stack of typewriter pages was gone.

Evelyn noticed it, too. "Where's his manuscript?"

"I can't imagine a whore using it for anything but toilet paper."

"Callahan got out of here fast. He must've taken the girlfriend."

"On the same night Mary Halston was left dead at Techwood."

"Coincidence?"

Amanda didn't know anymore.

"Let's go talk to the guy at the soup kitchen."

"We can at least ask the priest his name." They walked back into the main room. The priest was gone.

"Hello?" Evelyn called, though they could see every corner of the room. Amanda followed her outside. The sidewalk was empty. No one was in the parking lot. They even checked behind the building. "Well, at least he didn't lie to us."

"That we know of." Amanda walked back toward the Plymouth. The inside of the car was already baking. She turned the key in the ignition. "I'm so sick and tired of being in this car."

"You never really see Columbo driving anywhere."

"I guess Ironside doesn't count."

"I'd like to see what Techwood Homes would make of a cripple in a bread truck."

Amanda pulled out onto the street. "Pepper Anderson just magically appears wherever she needs to be."

"One week, she's a nurse at the hospital. Next week, she's racing on a speedboat. Then she's a go-go dancer, then a flight attendant flirting with some dreamy pilot. Hey—"

"Shut up."

Evelyn chuckled as she leaned her arm on the door. They were both quiet as Amanda drove the few blocks up to Juniper Street.

She asked, "Left? Right?"

"Pick one."

Amanda turned left. She slowed the car, checking each building on the left as Evelyn scanned the right.

They were almost to Pine Street when Evelyn said, "That must be it."

The building was derelict, nothing to indicate it was a church except the large wooden cross stuck in the small patch of yard. It was painted black. Someone had thought to put nails where Jesus's hands and feet would've been. Little red dots of paint indicated His suffering.

"What a dump," Evelyn said.

She was right. The brick façade was crumbling. There were large vertical cracks in the mortar. Graffiti riddled the stoop, which was constructed of dry-stacked cinder blocks. Two of the four downstairs windows were boarded over, but the corresponding windows up top seemed intact.

They both got out of the car and headed toward the building. Amanda felt a breeze from a car passing in the street. It was an Atlanta Police cruiser. The blue light flashed once in greeting, but the driver didn't stop.

The front door to the soup kitchen was open. Amanda smelled herbs and spices as soon as she crossed the threshold. Picnic tables filled the room. Plates and bowls were laid out. Napkins and spoons.

"No sharp objects," Evelyn noted.

"Probably wise." Amanda raised her voice. "Hello?"

"Just a minute," a gruff voice called from the back. They heard pots clattering. Heavy footsteps across the floor. The man came out of the kitchen. Amanda felt gripped by an unexpected fear. They'd learned at the academy that the average door was six feet eight inches high and thirty inches wide. It was a good gauge to estimate a person's height and weight. The man filled the kitchen doorway. His shoulders were almost as wide as the space between the jambs. His head nearly touched the top of the opening.

He smiled. His bottom tooth was crooked. His lips were full. "May I help you, Officers?"

Both of them stood frozen for a second. Amanda reached into her purse, found her badge. She showed it to the man, though he already knew they were cops. Amanda just wanted to say the words. "I'm Detective Wagner. This is Detective Mitchell."

"Please." He gestured to the table. "Have a seat."

He waited politely for them to sit, then took the bench across from them. Again, Amanda couldn't help but make comparisons. The man was almost as wide as both of them put together. Just the sight of his hands gripped together on the table was menacing. He could probably easily wrap his fingers around their necks.

Evelyn took out her notebook. She asked, "What's your name, sir?"

"James Ulster."

"Do you know Trey Callahan?"

He sighed. His voice was so deep that it came out as more of a growl. "Is this about the money he stole?"

"He stole money?" Amanda asked, though it was obvious he had.

"Father Bailey is more mindful of public relations than I am," Ulster explained. "One of the donors on the board noticed that some funds were missing. Trey was to be called to task first thing this morning. I gather he had other plans."

Amanda remembered the phone call Callahan had gotten yesterday when they were in his office. The man had said a donor was on the line. She asked, "They're certain it was Trey who was embezzling money?"

"I'm afraid so." Ulster rested his hands on either side of the bench. He was slumped down, probably out of habit. Such a large man would be accustomed to people feeling intimidated. Though, considering he ran a soup kitchen for Atlanta's huddled masses, his size was probably more of an advantage than not.

Amanda asked, "Do you have any idea where Callahan might have gone?"

Ulster shook his head. "I believe he has a fiancée."

They would have to go to Georgia Baptist next, though Amanda was fairly certain that was a dead end. "You're friends with Mr. Callahan?"

"Did he say that?"

Amanda lied. "He said that you were. Is that wrong?"

"We had theological discussions. We talked about many different things."

"Shakespeare?" Amanda asked. It was a stab in the dark, but it worked.

"Sometimes," Ulster admitted. "Many authors of the seventeenth century wrote in a coded language. It was not a time when subversives were rewarded."

"As in Hamlet?" Evelyn asked.

"That's not the best example, but—yes."

"What about Ophelia?"

Ulster's tone took a sharp edge. "She was a liar and a whore."

Amanda felt Evelyn stiffen beside her. She said, "You seem sure of that."

"I'm sorry, but I find the subject matter tiresome. Trey was obsessed with the story. You couldn't often have a conversation without him quoting some obscure line."

That seemed true enough. "Do you know why?"

"It's no secret that he was particularly interested in fallen women. Redemption. Salvation. I'm sure you were treated to one of his lectures on how all of these girls can be saved. He was quite adamant about it, and took it very personally when they failed." Ulster shook his head. "And of course, they do fail. They continually fail. It's in their nature."

Evelyn asked, "Did you ever see Trey acting inappropriately with the girls?"

"I wasn't often at the mission. My work is here. It wouldn't surprise me to learn that he availed himself. He stole money from a charitable organization. Why would he stop at exploiting fallen women?"

"Did you ever see him angry?"

"Not with my own eyes, but I heard that he had quite a temper. Some of the girls mentioned that he could be violent."

Amanda glanced down at Evelyn's notebook. She wasn't writing down any of this. Maybe she was thinking the same thing as Amanda. Trey Callahan was probably stoned out of his mind most of his waking hours. It was hard to imagine him experiencing anger, let alone acting on it. Of course, they hadn't pegged him for a thief, either.

Evelyn said, "Trey Callahan was writing a book."

"Yes." Ulster drew out the sibilant. "His opus. It wasn't very good."

"You read it?"

"A few pages. Callahan was more suited for the job he had than the job he wanted." He smiled at them. "So many people would better know peace if they just accepted the plans the Lord has for them."

Amanda got the feeling that Ulster was talking to them directly.

Evelyn must've felt the same. Her tone was curt when she asked, "What exactly do you do here, Mr. Ulster?"

"Well, we feed people, obviously. Breakfast is at six in the morning. The lunch hour begins at noon. You'll find the tables start to fill up well before then."

"Those are your only meals?"

"No, we provide dinner as well. That begins at five and is over promptly at seven."

"And then they leave?"

"Most do. Some of them stay the evening. There are twenty beds upstairs. A shower, though the hot water is not reliable. Women only, of course." He made to stand. "Shall I show you?"

"That's not necessary." Amanda didn't want to be trapped upstairs with the man. She asked, "Do you stay here at night?"

"No, there's no need for that. Father Bailey's parish is down the street. He comes by at eleven every evening to lock them in, then he lets them out at six every morning."

Amanda asked, "How long have you worked here?"

He thought it over. "It will be two years come fall."

"What did you do before that?"

"I was a foreman at the railroad yard."

Evelyn indicated the building. "You'll forgive me for saying, but I can't imagine the pay here is on par."

"No, it is not, and what little I make I try to give back."

"You don't get paid for working here—" Evelyn did the math quickly. "Thirteen hours a day?"

"As I said, I take what I need. But it's closer to sixteen hours a day. Seven days a week." He gave an open-handed shrug. "Why would I need earthly riches when my rewards will be in heaven?"

Evelyn shifted on the bench. She seemed as uncomfortable as Amanda felt. "Did you ever meet a working girl named Kitty Treadwell?"

"No." He stared at them blankly. "Not that I can recall, but we have many prostitutes here.”

Amanda unzipped her purse and found the license. She showed him Kitty’s photograph.

Ulster reached out for the paper. He was careful not to touch her hand. He studied the photograph, then his eyes shifted to the name and address. His lips moved silently, as if he was sounding out the words.

He finally said, “She looks markedly healthier in this photo. I suppose it was taken before she succumbed to the devil of her addiction.”

Evelyn clarified, “So you knew Kitty?”

“Yes, if not by name.”

“When’s the last time you saw her?”

“A month ago? Maybe more.”

That didn’t make sense. Amanda laid out Lucy Bennett’s license, then Mary Halston’s. “How about these girls?”

He leaned over the table and studied them one by one. He took his time. Again, his lips moved as he read the names. Amanda listened to his breathing, the steady inhale and exhale. She could see the top of his head. Dandruff dotted his light brown hair.

“Yes.” He looked up. “This girl. She was here a few times, but she favored the mission. I expect because she had a thing with Trey.” He was pointing to Mary Halston, the murder victim from last night. “This girl.” He pointed to Lucy. “I’m not sure about her. They both look very similar. They are both obviously drug addicts. It is the scourge of our generation.”

Evelyn verified, “You recognize Lucy Bennett and Mary Halston as girls who’ve used this soup kitchen?”

“I believe so.”

Evelyn was writing now. “And Mary was a favorite of Trey Callahan’s?”

“That’s correct.”

“When’s the last time you saw either Lucy or Mary?”

“A few weeks ago? Maybe a month?” Again, he studied the photos. “They both look very healthy in these photographs.” He looked back up, first at Evelyn, then Amanda. “You are both police officers, so I assume you are more accustomed to the ravages of drug abuse. These girls. These poor girls.” He sadly shook his head. “Drugs are a poison, and I do not know why our Lord caused it to be, but there is a certain type who succumbs to this temptation. They tremble before the drug when they should be trembling before the Lord.”

His voice resonated in the open room. Amanda could imagine him holding forth from the pulpit. Or the streets. “There’s a pimp whose street name is Juice.”

“I am familiar with that sinner.”

“He says you sometimes preach to the girls when they’re working?”

“I do the Lord’s work, no matter the danger.”

Amanda didn’t imagine he felt much danger, considering no sane person would be happy to run into a man as large as James Ulster in a dark alley. “Have you ever been to Techwood Homes?”

“On many occasions,” he answered. “I deliver soup to the shut-ins. Techwood is Mondays and Fridays. Grady Homes is Tuesdays and Thursdays. There is another kitchen that services Perry Homes, Washington Heights—”

"Thank you," Evelyn interrupted, "but we're just concerned with Techwood."

"I've heard that there have been some awful things happening there." He gripped his hands together. "It tries the soul to see how those people live. But I suppose we all shuffle off the same mortal coil."

Amanda felt her heart stop mid-beat. "Trey Callahan used that same phrase with us. It's from Shakespeare."

"Is it?" he asked. "Perhaps I picked up his manner of speaking. As I said, he was incessant on the topic."

"Do you remember a working girl named Jane Delray?"

"No. Is she in trouble?"

"How about Hank Bennett? Have you ever met him?" Evelyn waited, but Ulster shook his head. "He's got hair about your color. Around six feet tall. Very well dressed."

"No, sister, I'm afraid I do not."

The radio in Evelyn's purse clicked. There was a muffled call, followed by a series of clicks. Evelyn reached into the bag to turn down the sound, but then stopped when her name came through the speaker.

"Mitchell?" Amanda recognized Butch Bonnie's voice.

"Excuse me," she said, taking out the radio. "Mitchell, ten-four."

Butch ordered, "Twenty-five me your location. Now."

There were more clicks on the radio—a collective response of laughter. Butch was telling them both to meet him outside.

Evelyn told Ulster, "Thank you for speaking with us. I hope you won't mind if we call with any questions?"

"Of course not. Shall I give you my telephone number?"

Her pen nearly disappeared in Ulster's left hand. He gripped it in his fist, not between his thumb and index finger, as he wrote down the seven digits. Above this, he carefully wrote his name. It was more like a child's scrawl. The ballpoint tore through the paper on the last letter.

"Thank you," Evelyn said. She was visibly reluctant to take back the pen. She slid on the cap and closed her notebook. Ulster stood when they did. He offered his hand to each of them. They were all sweating in the heat, but there was something particularly clammy about Ulster's skin. He held their hands delicately, but for Amanda's part, it only served to remind her that he could crush the bones if he so chose.

Evelyn's breathing was shallow as they walked toward the door. "Jesus," she whispered. As relieved as they both were to be away from Ulster, the sight of Butch Bonnie almost sent Amanda back inside. He was obviously livid.

"What the fuck are you two doing?" He grabbed Evelyn by the arm and dragged her down the cinder-block stairs.

Amanda said, "Don't you—"

"Shut your face!" He pushed Amanda against the wall. His fist reared back, but stopped short of punching her. "How many times do you have to be told?" he demanded. "Both of you!" He stepped back. His feet scuffed across the sidewalk. "Jesus Christ."

Amanda pressed her hand to her chest. She could feel her heart punching against her rib cage. And then she saw that Evelyn had fallen. She ran to help her up.

"No." Evelyn stood up on her own. She slammed both hands into Butch's chest.

"What the—" He stumbled back.

She slammed him again. Then again, until he was up against the wall. "If you ever touch me like that again, I will shoot you in the face. Do you hear me?"

Butch looked dumbstruck. "What the hell's gotten into you?"

Evelyn paced back and forth. She was like a caged animal. "I am so sick of you assholes."

"Me?" Butch took out his cigarettes. "Whadabout you broads? How many times you gotta be told to leave this be?" He dug his finger into the pack. "I tried to be nice. I tried to warn you easy. And then I hear you're snooping around my CI. Making trouble. Mr. Nice Guy ain't workin'. What else am I supposed to do?"

"Who's your CI?"

"None of your goddamn business."

Evelyn slapped away the cigarettes. She was so gripped by anger she had trouble speaking. "You know that dead woman is Jane Delray."

His eyes cut to the side. "I don't know shit."

"Who told you to say it was Lucy Bennett?"

"Ain't nobody tellin' me to do nothin'."

Evelyn wouldn't give up. "Juice didn't kill Lucy Bennett."

"You best be careful pining after some nigger in jail." He gave her a condescending look as he picked up his Marlboros. "Jesus, Ev. Why you comin' off like some kind of bull dyke?" He looked to Amanda for help. "Come on, Wag. Talk some sense into Annie Oakley here."

Amanda tasted bile in her throat. She threw out the filthiest thing she could think of. "You motherfucker."

He barked a shocked laugh. "You're motherfuckerin' me?" He fished in his pocket for his lighter. "You wanna know who's mother-fucked?" He lit the cigarette. "You're fucked"—he nodded toward Amanda—"for going to the jail yesterday, and you"—he pointed to Evelyn—"are fucked for putting her up to all this."

"Putting me up to what?" Amanda demanded. "She's not my keeper."

He hissed out a stream of smoke. "You're both gonna be transferred tomorrow. I hope you still got your white gloves for crossing duty."

"I hope you're up for a sex discrimination lawsuit," Evelyn shot back. "You and Landry both."

Smoke snorted out from his nostrils. "You ditzzy bitches throw that around all the time, but you know what? Ain't a one'a you done it yet. Keep cryin' wolf while you're directing traffic." He waved to them over his shoulder as he walked away.

Evelyn stood watching him, her fists clenching and unclenching. For just a moment, Amanda thought she might chase after Butch and jump on his back. Amanda wasn't sure what she would do if this happened. Her fingernails were short but strong. She could probably scratch his eyes. Failing that, she would bite off anything she could get between her teeth.

"I am so sick of this." Evelyn started pacing again. "I am sick of taking bullshit from them. I am sick of being lied to." She kicked the Plymouth's tire. "I'm sick of not getting a car. I'm sick of people thinking I'm some kind of fucking secretary." She gripped her purse. "Why didn't I shoot him? God, I wanted to shoot him."

"We can do it now." Amanda had never been so ready to do anything in her life. "We'll go find him and do it right now."

Evelyn hefted her purse over her shoulder. She crossed her arms. "I'm not going to prison for that—" She stopped. "What did you call him? Motherfucker?" She gave a surprised laugh. "I didn't know you even knew that word."

Amanda realized her hands were clenched, too. She stretched out her fingers one by one. "I suppose this is what happens when you hang around pimps and whores."

"Crossing guard duty." Evelyn disgustedly huffed out the words. "It's summer. We'll be stuck with all the stupid kids who couldn't hack it during the regular year."

Amanda opened the car door. "Let's go to Georgia Baptist and see if we can find Trey Callahan's fiancée."

"Are you kidding me? You heard what Butch said."

"That's tomorrow. Let's just worry about today."

Evelyn walked around to the other side of the car. "And then what, Scarlett O'Hara?"

"And then we go to Techwood and see if Miss Lula found someone who remembered seeing Hank Bennett." Amanda turned over the ignition. "And then ask her if she's ever seen a giant weird man delivering soup to shut-ins."

Evelyn clutched her purse in her lap. "Ulster admitted that he's in and out of Techwood Homes. Mondays and Fridays. The same days our victims showed up."

"He lied to us." Amanda pulled out onto the street. "How could he read Trey Callahan's manuscript if he can barely read the name on a license?"

"You noticed that, too?" Evelyn said, "He didn't sound retarded."

"Maybe he's just a slow reader."

"Butch said we were messing with his CI. Do you think that's Ulster? Father Bailey? I wonder where that weasel scurried off to. Locking those girls in at night. It's a regular Triangle Shirtwaist Factory. Have you ever?"

"Ulster seemed pretty eager to put Trey Callahan in the frame for all this. The Ophelia line. That bit about his temper."

"You clocked that, too?" Evelyn rested her elbow on the door. "I know we're all Christians here, but I don't like the way Ulster uses it. Like it makes him better than everyone else. Did you pick up on that?"

Amanda was only certain of one thing. "I think James Ulster is the scariest man I've ever met in my life. There's something evil about him."

"Exactly," Evelyn agreed. "Did you see how big his hands are?"

Amanda felt a shudder working its way up her spine.

Evelyn said, "Someone higher up is working against us."

"I know," Amanda mumbled.

"Butch is connected, but not enough to get us transferred. It has to be somebody who knew you were talking to Juice at the jail yesterday. Who knew we were talking to Ulster today. And Father Bailey. And Trey Callahan. Or, maybe I stirred up something checking the DNFs.” She chewed her lip. “Whatever we did, it pissed off someone enough to get us yanked off the street and tied to crossing duty.”

“I know,” Amanda repeated. She waited for Evelyn to say more, but the woman had probably jumped to the same conclusion as Amanda. Duke Wagner wasn’t officially back in uniform, but he was already pulling strings.

Amanda looked at her watch. Eight-fifteen in the evening. Nighttime brought no relief from the summer heat. If anything, it gave the humidity reason to come out and play. Amanda felt as if her sweat was sweating. Mosquitoes circled her head as she stood in front of the phone booth on the corner of Juniper and Pine. She left the door open so that the light would not come on. The dime felt greasy between her fingers. Amanda dropped the coin into the slot, then slowly dialed her father’s number.

She’d left Duke’s house fifteen minutes ago. Amanda had cooked his supper. She’d listened with half an ear as he’d relayed the day’s news, delivered the latest updates on his case. It was just a matter of time before Duke was back at his old post. Just a matter of time before Amanda was back under his thumb. She had only nodded—nodded as she watched him eat, nodded as she washed the dishes. An overwhelming sadness had taken hold. Every time she opened her mouth to speak, she shut it for fear of crying.

Duke picked up the telephone on the first ring. His voice was gravelly, probably from too many after-dinner cigarettes. “Hello?”

“Daddy, it’s me.”

“You home?”

“No, Daddy.”

He waited, then asked, “Car break down?”

“No, sir.”

She heard his recliner squeak. “What is it? I know something’s bothering you. You were sulking all night.”

Amanda caught her reflection in the chrome of the pay phone. She was twenty-five years old. She had touched a dead person last weekend. She had stared down a pimp yesterday morning. Helped examine a dead girl last night. She had stood up to Butch Bonnie in the street. She should be able to have a frank conversation with her father.

She asked, “Why did you have me transferred to crossing guard duty?”

“What?” He seemed genuinely surprised. “I didn’t transfer you. Who the hell transferred you?” She could hear papers rustling, a pen clicking. “Give me the jackass’s name. I’ll talk to him about a transfer.”

“You didn’t do it?”

“Why would I transfer you out when I’m gonna be back at my old squad in less than a month?”

He was right. What’s more, if Duke was displeased with someone, he generally told them to their face. “I’m on crossing duty, starting tomorrow.” She’d already called dispatch to verify it was true. “Along with Evelyn Mitchell.”

“Mitchell?” His tone changed. “What’re you doing with that pushy broad? I told you to stay away from her.”

“I know you did, but we’re working a case together.”

He grunted. "What kind of case?"

"Two girls have been murdered." She added, "White girls. They lived at Techwood Homes."

"Whores, I guess?"

"Yes, they were."

He was silent, obviously thinking. "This have something to do with that nigger got charged for killing a white girl?"

"Yes, sir."

She heard the flick of his lighter, a huff of air as he exhaled. "That why you were at the jail yesterday morning?"

Amanda couldn't swallow past the lump in her throat. She saw her life starting to disappear before her eyes. Her apartment. Her job. Her freedom.

Duke said, "Heard you stared that coon down. Locked yourself in a room with him."

Amanda didn't answer. Hearing Duke say the words made her realize how crazy she had been. How stupid. She was lucky she'd escaped with her life.

Duke asked, "Were you scared?"

She knew he would see through a lie. "I was terrified."

"But you didn't let him see it."

"No, sir."

She heard him take another long drag on his cigarette. "I guess you think you're going to be out late tonight?"

"I—" Amanda didn't know what to say. She glanced down the street. The moon was almost full in the sky. The black wooden cross cast a shadow across the sidewalk in front of the soup kitchen. "We're staking out a possible suspect."

"We?"

She let the question go unanswered.

"What evidence do you got?"

"Nothing," she admitted. "Just—" She searched for a better explanation, but could only come up with, "Women's intuition."

"Don't call it that," he ordered. "Call it a hunch. You feel it in your gut, not between your legs."

Amanda didn't know what to say other than, "All right."

He coughed a few times. "That's Rick Landry's case you're poking around, right?"

"Yes, sir."

"I wouldn't trust that idiot to find his asshole in a snowstorm." His chuckle turned into a sharp cough. "If you're out late, you'll need your sleep. I'll get myself breakfast tomorrow morning."

The phone clicked in her ear. Amanda stared at the receiver as if the plastic mouthpiece could explain to her what had just happened. She didn't look up until a pair of headlights flashed for her attention.

Evelyn's Falcon station wagon smelled of candy and cheap wine. She smiled as Amanda settled into the passenger's seat. "You okay?"

"Just puzzled." She told Evelyn about the phone call with her father.

"Well." Evelyn sounded circumspect. "Do you think he's telling the truth?"

"Yes." Duke was a lot of things, but he was not a liar.

"Then he must be telling the truth."

Amanda knew that Evelyn would never trust Duke. She could understand why. As far as the other woman was concerned, he was cut from the same cloth as Rick Landry and Butch Bonnie. And maybe he was, but he was still Amanda's father.

Evelyn stared down the street at the soup kitchen. "Is Ulster even in there?"

"He's cleaning up." Amanda had walked by earlier and seen James Ulster lifting a large soup pot off the table. His back was to her, but she'd still quickened her step. "There's a green van parked behind the building. I called in the license plate—it's registered to the church. There were some religious tracts in the front seat, a Bible on the dash. It has wooden crates in the back, a bunch of ropes. I guess he uses them to keep the food from spilling."

"Delivering food to the needy. That sounds like a serial killer to me."

"Surely you can think of one?"

Evelyn wasn't up for teasing. "Driving over here, part of me felt like I was going to my own funeral." She crossed her arms low on her waist. "Our last day on the job, or at least our real job. The job we want to do. I don't think I can fit into my crossing guard uniform anymore. I thought that thing was retired."

Amanda didn't want to talk about it. "Did you call Georgia Baptist?"

"Callahan's fiancée is named Eileen Sapperson so at least we were told the truth about that. She didn't show up for work this morning. No home phone number. No address. Another Doug Henning magical disappearance."

"Another dead end," Amanda noted. Miss Lula hadn't been able to find anyone at Techwood who remembered seeing a man fitting Hank Bennett's description, and while plenty of people knew the hulking Mr. Ulster, none of them had ever seen him cause trouble. It was hard to make enemies of people to whom you were bringing a hot meal.

Evelyn said, "James Ulster is at Techwood every Monday and Friday, the same days the victims were found."

"He's in and out so much that no one would notice him," Amanda added. "He knew Kitty, at least. He knew enough about Mary Halston to say that Trey had a thing for her. He probably knew Lucy Bennett, too."

"He's the only one who puts the girls as alive recently. Jane Delray, Hank Bennett, Trey Callahan, Juice—they all say the three girls have been gone at least a year."

"Maybe Ulster is Butch's CI. He could've said Lucy Bennett was dead so her brother would stop looking for her."

"Was he really looking for her?" Evelyn asked. "As far as we know, he stopped when he found Kitty. And none of this explains why Hodge sent us out in the first place. Or who transferred us if it wasn't your father. Any of it."

Amanda couldn't bear the thought of spinning it all around again. No matter how many times they talked it through, the construction paper puzzle would likely never be solved. Evelyn had her family to go home to. Amanda had her schoolwork, a major paper to write. They had never really been assigned this case, and tomorrow, their authority would be no greater than that conferred upon them by screaming school-aged adolescents.

Evelyn said, "I was thinking—what would happen if I really did file a sexual discrimination suit?" She rested her hand on the steering wheel. "What would they do? The law is on my side. Butch is right. We can't keep threatening it without following through. It's lost its teeth."

"You'd never get promoted again. They'd stick you at the airport, which is only marginally more humiliating than crossing duty." Amanda felt the need to tell her, "But I would testify for you. I saw what Rick did. And Butch. They had no right to do that."

"Oh, Mandy, you're such a good friend." She reached out and grabbed Amanda's hand. "You've made this stupid job almost bearable."

Amanda looked down at their hands. Evelyn's were so much more elegant than her own. "You've never called me Mandy before."

"You don't really seem like one."

Amanda didn't feel like one anymore. Did a Mandy go into a jailhouse and rattle a pimp? Did a Mandy stand up to bullies and call them nasty names?

Evelyn said, "You know, I was so scared of you when Hodge first sent us on that call."

Amanda didn't have to ask why. If this week had taught her anything, it was that the Wagner name was not the asset she once believed.

Evelyn said, "But you turned out to be so swell. If there's anything good that came out of this, it's our friendship."

Amanda had been fighting weepiness all night. She could only nod.

Evelyn squeezed her hand before letting go. "I don't have many friends. Any friends, really."

"I find that hard to believe."

"Oh, I used to have lots of them." She twisted her fingers into her hair. "Bill and I would go to parties every weekend. Two or three. Sometimes four." She let out a long sigh. "Everyone thought it was a gas when I joined the force, but then they saw I wasn't going to quit and suddenly there was nothing we could talk about. I didn't want to swap recipes or plan bake sales. They couldn't understand why I would want to do a man's job. You should hear my mother-in-law on the subject." She laughed ruefully. "This job changes you. It changes how you think, how you see the world. I don't care what the boys say. We are cops. We live it and breathe it as much as they do."

"You don't see Butch and Landry out here right now."

"No, they're probably home with their families."

Amanda doubted that. "Their mistresses, more likely."

"Hey, that's him." They saw Ulster locking the front door of the building. The darkness did him no favors. He was a hulking man. Amanda could not imagine anyone putting up much of a struggle against such raw power.

He glanced up the street. Both Amanda and Evelyn ducked, but Ulster didn't seem to notice the red station wagon, or if he did, he didn't think much of it. In retrospect, the car—with its children's toys in the back and crayons melted into the carpet—was the perfect cover.

Amanda held her breath as she waited for Ulster to reappear. It felt like hours but was only minutes before Evelyn finally said, "Here he comes."

The green van turned onto Juniper. They stayed hunched down as it passed. Evelyn cranked the key. The engine sputtered, then caught. She pushed the knob to make sure the headlights were off, then swung the nose out into the street and smoothly entered the opposite lane.

"You're getting better at this," Amanda said.

"Last hurrah," she muttered.

There were no streetlights on Juniper. The moon was enough to drive by, and where she couldn't see, Evelyn coasted her way through.

Ulster took a left onto Piedmont Avenue. He drove deep into Bedford Pine. The stench of Buttermilk Bottom filled the car, but they kept the windows down.

"Where is he going?" Evelyn asked.

Amanda shook her head. She had no idea.

The van braked at the last minute, taking a sharp turn onto Ralph McGill. Amanda directed, "Cut over to Courtland."

Evelyn had to reverse to make the turn. "Do you think he spotted us?"

"I don't know." Their headlights were still off. The car's interior was dark. "Maybe he's just being careful."

"Why would he be careful?" Evelyn sucked in her breath. The green van was up ahead. "There he is."

They followed the van up Courtland. The road was a straight shot. Evelyn hung back at least a hundred yards. When the van turned onto Pine, the lights from Crawford Long Hospital illuminated the interior. They saw Ulster's unmistakable frame. Evelyn slowed, peering down the street before making the turn to follow him. The lights from the expressway made the going more difficult. He turned onto Spring Street.

"Evelyn," Amanda said.

"I know." She followed him up North Avenue. Past the Varsity. Over the expressway. He was going to Techwood. "Get my radio."

Amanda found Evelyn's purse on the back seat. The revolver was cold in her hands. She passed this to Evelyn, who kept one hand on the wheel as she slid the gun underneath her leg.

Amanda clicked the radio. "Dispatch?"

There was no answer.

"Dispatch, this is unit sixteen. Over?"

The radio clicked. "Unit twenty-three to unit sixteen," a man's voice said. "You gals need some help?"

Amanda gripped the radio in her hand. She had called for dispatch, not some hillbilly out on patrol.

"Copy sixteen?" the man asked. "What's your locale?"

Amanda spoke through gritted teeth. "Techwood Homes."

"Repeat, please."

Amanda enunciated the words. "Tech. Wood. Homes."

"Copy that. Perry Homes."

"Jesus," Evelyn hissed. "He thinks this is a joke."

Amanda clutched the radio as hard as she could, wanting to break it over the man's head. She put her finger to the button, but couldn't bring herself to press it.

"Amanda," Evelyn mumbled. Her voice had a tone of warning.

Up ahead, the green van didn't slow to turn on Techwood Drive. Instead, it continued straight, going into the heart of the ghetto.

"This isn't good," Evelyn said. "There's no reason for him to be here."

Amanda didn't bother to vocalize her agreement. They were in a part of town that no one—black, white, cop, or criminal—willingly entered after dark.

The van turned again. Evelyn slowed, nosing into the turn, making sure they weren't sitting ducks. Just ahead, they saw the van's taillights glowing softly. Ulster obviously knew where he was going. His pace was slow and deliberate.

Amanda tried the radio again. "Dispatch, sixteen going north on Cherry."

The man in unit twenty-three answered. "What's that, sixteen? You wanna gimme your cherry?"

There was more clicking as the radio was jammed.

Dispatch cut through the chatter. "Ten-thirty-four, all units. Sixteen, repeat your ten-twenty."

Evelyn said, "That's Rachel Foster." The women in dispatch were the only ones who could override the nonsense. Evelyn grabbed the radio. "Sixteen heading north on Cherry. Possible thirty-four on a green Dodge van. Georgia license plate—" She squinted at the van. "Charlie, Victor, William, eight-eight-eight."

Rachel said, "Verify ten-twenty, unit sixteen?"

Amanda took the radio so Evelyn could return both hands to the wheel. "Verify Cherry Street, Dispatch. Heading north."

"Are you kidding me?" Rachel's tone was terse. She knew the streets better than most cops on the road. "Sixteen?"

The car was silent. They both stared at the green van heading deep into the ghetto. Was Ulster leading them into a trap?

"Sixteen?" Rachel repeated.

Amanda said, "Verify heading North on Cherry."

Static filled the seconds. Rachel said, "Give me five minutes. Hold your location. Repeat, hold."

Amanda put the radio in her lap. Evelyn kept driving.

Amanda asked, "Why did you report the van as possibly stolen?"

"All we need is whoever that cowboy is on unit twenty-three rushing in here with lights and sirens."

"Maybe that wouldn't be such a bad thing." Amanda had never been in this part of town. She doubted any white woman ever had. There were no street signs. No lights on inside the houses that dotted either side of the street. Even the moon seemed to glow less brightly here.

The van took another left. The air felt too thick. Amanda had to breathe through her mouth. The street was lined with junker cars on both sides. If Evelyn followed Ulster, there would be no way to hide the station wagon from him. In the end, they didn't need to. The van's brake lights flashed as he slowed down and turned into the driveway of a clapboard house. As with the others, there were no lights on inside. Electricity was a luxury in this part of town.

"Are they abandoned?" Evelyn asked, meaning the houses. Some of them were boarded up. Others were so dilapidated that the roofs had caved in.

"I can't tell."

They both sat in the car. Ulster got out of the van and entered the house. Neither woman knew what to do. They couldn't very well kick down the door and go in guns blazing.

Amanda said, "Rachel should've radioed back by now."

Evelyn kept her hands gripped around the steering wheel. They both stared at Ulster's house. A light came on in one of the back rooms. It cut a sliver of white across the front of the green van parked in the driveway.

Evelyn's voice was little more than a whisper. "Would you think I was a coward if I said we should call in unit twenty-three?"

Amanda had been wondering how to ask the same question. "He could tell Ulster the van was reported stolen."

"And ask to look around inside the house."

And get shot in the face. Or chest. Or punched. Or stabbed. Or beaten.

"Do it," Evelyn said.

Amanda pressed the button on the radio. "Twenty-three?" There was only static. Even the clicks were gone. "Dispatch?"

"Shit," Evelyn cursed. "We're probably in a pocket." There were dead spots all over the city. Evelyn put the car in reverse. "It was working the last block over. We can—"

A scream pierced the air. It was feral, terror inducing. Something inside of Amanda recoiled. Her body broke out in a cold sweat. Every muscle tensed. The sound triggered a primitive urge to flee.

"My God," Evelyn gasped. "Was that an animal?"

Amanda could still hear the sound echoing in her ears. She'd never heard anything so terrifying in her life.

Suddenly, the radio came to life. "Sixteen? Twenty-three here. You foxes reconsider my offer?"

"Thank God," Evelyn whispered. She pressed the button, but didn't have time to speak.

The second scream was like a knife cutting straight through Amanda's heart. It wasn't an animal. It was the desperate cry of a woman begging for help.

The radio crackled. "Sixteen, what the hell was that?"

Amanda's purse was on the floorboard. She reached inside and pulled out her revolver. She grabbed the door handle.

Evelyn's foot slipped off the brake. "What are you doing?"

"Stop the car." It was rolling back. "Stop the car."

"Amanda, you can't—"

The woman screamed again.

Amanda pushed open the door. She stumbled as she got out of the car. Her knee dug into the asphalt. Her hose ripped. She couldn't stop herself. Wouldn't stop herself. "Get twenty-three. Get everybody you can." Evelyn yelled for her to wait, but Amanda kicked off her shoes and started running.

The woman screamed again. She was in the house. Ulster's house.

Amanda tightened her grip on the revolver as she ran down the street. Her arms pumped. Her vision tunneled. She slipped as she rounded into Ulster's driveway. Her hose bunched up at the balls of her feet. She slowed. The front door was shut. The only light was toward the back of the house.

Amanda tried to quiet her breathing, keeping her mouth open, taking in gulps of air. She squeezed past the van. She crouched down low, though no one could see her. The house blocked the moonlight, painting everything in shadow. She pointed her revolver straight ahead, finger on the trigger, not on the side like they had taught her, because she was going to shoot anybody who walked into her path.

The scream came again. It wasn't as loud this time, but it was more desperate.

More frightened.

Amanda steeled herself as she approached the open window. The light was coming through a pair of heavy black curtains. She could hear the woman moaning with each breath. Almost mewling. Carefully, Amanda peered through the part in the curtains. She saw an old washstand. A sink. A bed. The woman was there. Sitting up. Blonde hair streaked red. Emaciated but for her distended belly. The skin on her arms and shoulders was a bloody pulp. Her lips and eyelids were torn where she'd ripped them open. Blood coated every inch of her skin—her face, her throat, her chest.

The girl screamed again, but not before Amanda heard something behind her.

A shoe scuffing on concrete.

Amanda started to turn, but a large hand grabbed her from behind.

July 15, 1975

LUCY BENNETT

Her shoulders were free, but she did not care.

Her arms were free, but she did not care.

Her waist, her hips—free for the first time in over a year.

But she did not care.

Could not care.

There was only the baby delivered from her body. The beautiful little boy. Ten fingers. Ten toes. Perfect blond hair. Perfect little mouth.

Lucy ran her finger along his lips. The first woman to touch him. The first woman to open her heart and feel the absolute joy that was this creature.

She wiped the slime from his nose and mouth. She lightly rested her palm on his chest and felt his beating heart. Flutter, flutter, like a butterfly. He was so beautiful. So tiny. How had something so perfect grown inside of her? How had something so sweet come out of something so utterly spoiled?

“You’re dying.”

Lucy felt her senses sharpen.

Patty Hearst.

The second girl. The other woman from the other room.

She stood in the doorway, afraid to come in. She was dressed. He let her wear clothes. He let her walk around. He let her do anything but come into Lucy’s room. Even now, both of them alone, her toes would not cross the threshold.

“You’re dying,” the woman repeated.

They both heard the noises outside the window. Yelling. Gunfire. He would win. He would always win.

The baby cooed, legs kicking up.

Lucy looked down at her child. Her perfect baby. Her redemption. Her salvation. Her one good thing.

She tried to concentrate on his beautiful face, the light flowing back and forth between their bodies.

Nothing else mattered. Not the pain. Not the smell. Not the wheezing breaths coming from her own mouth.

Not the sucking of wind around the large knife sticking out of her chest.

Present Day

WEDNESDAY

Sara woke to the smell of Betty's hot breath. The dog was curled on the couch in front of her, body twisted, snout inches from Sara's face. Sara rolled the little thing over like a baker making bread. Betty's collar tinkled. She yawned.

Will's clothes were on the floor, but he wasn't in the room. Sara put her hand to her face. Touched her lips where Will had touched them. Stroked her throat. Her mouth felt bruised from his kisses. Her skin tingled at the thought of him.

She was in it now. Maybe it had happened back when Will was washing dishes in her mother's kitchen. Or that day at work when Sara had felt completely inconsolable until he gently caressed her hand. Or last night when he had stared at her so intently that she felt as if everything inside her was opening up to him.

No matter when it had happened, the possibility had been rendered fact. Sara was deeply and profoundly in love with Will Trent. There was no walking back from it. No denying it. Her heart had made the decision while her brain was making excuses. She knew it the minute she saw him last night. Sara would do anything to keep him. Accept his secrets. Tolerate his silences. Put up with his awful wife.

Help send his father to death row.

Pete Hanson would be dead by the time the case went to trial. Sara would be called to testify. It would be a capital case. The girl had been kidnapped and murdered, the combination of which met Georgia's legal requirement for seeking the death penalty.

Will's father had meticulously cleaned Ashleigh Snyder, but the man had been behind bars for the last three decades. Television and prison science would've educated him on the forensic progress happening outside his cellblock, but it was highly unlikely that he'd ever heard of hair extensions. Which was ironic, considering the killer's predilection for needle and thread.

The process of weaving hair took hours. A thin cornrow, or "track," was braided in a tight half circle around the back of the head. Then a needle and thread were used to sew in patches of new, longer, fuller hair. Several more rows were added one at a time, depending on how much money and time the woman was willing to spend. It wasn't cheap. The natural hair eventually grew out. The weave had to be tightened every two weeks. More stitches were added each time. Simple shampooing couldn't clean out all the nooks and crevices between the old hair and new.

This was where Sara had recovered traces of semen—tiny dried specks trapped between thin strings of thread. She would eventually have to walk the jury through her discovery, describe the weaving technique and explain why the proteins in seminal fluid fluoresce under black light.

And then the judge would likely hand down a sentence of death by lethal injection.

Sara let out a heavy sigh. She looked at the clock. Six-thirty in the morning. She was supposed to be at work by eight. She found Will's shirt and put it on, buttoning it as she walked into the kitchen.

He was standing at the stove making pancakes. He smiled at her. "Hungry?"

"Very." Sara kissed the back of his neck. His skin was warm. She resisted the urge to wrap her arms around him and declare her love. Will's life was complicated enough right now without Sara putting him on the spot. Telling someone you loved them was tantamount to asking them to repeat the words back.

Will said, "Sorry I don't have any coffee."

Sara sat down at the table. Will didn't drink coffee. He drank hot chocolate every morning, and because that wasn't enough sugar, he usually complemented his beverage with a Pop-Tart. "I'll get some later."

He offered, "I can make eggs if you want."

"No, thank you." Sara rubbed her face with her hands. Her brain wasn't awake yet, but she could tell that there was something wrong. Will was already dressed for work in a navy suit and tie. His jacket was draped over the kitchen chair. His hair was combed. His face was freshly shaven. He seemed happy, which wasn't that unusual, but he was too happy. Too bouncy. He couldn't stand still. His foot tapped as he stood at the stove. When he slid the pancakes onto a plate, his fingers drummed on the counter.

Sara had seen this kind of attitude before. It usually came when someone had made up their mind. The pressure was off. The decision was made. They were all in. Ready to get it over with.

"Madam." He put the plate in front of her.

She smelled it then—oil and cordite. On his hands. On the table.

"Thanks." Sara stood from the chair. She washed her hands at the sink. The smell was stronger now that she was awake and thinking. Will had cleaned up after himself, but not well enough. She wiped her hands with a paper towel. When she opened the cabinet for the trash, she saw the dirty cleaning patches.

Sara closed the cabinet door. She'd grown up around guns. She knew the smell of cleaning oil. She knew Will kept a backup weapon in his safe. She knew the look of a man who'd made up his mind.

She turned around.

Will was sitting at the table, fork in his hand. His plate was dripping with syrup. He talked around a mouthful of pancakes. "I got your gym bag out of the car." He used the fork to point to the bag on the floor. "Sorry about tearing your dress."

She leaned against the sink. "You're working at the airport today?"

He nodded. "Mind if I borrow your car? Mine's acting up."

"Sure." They would be looking for Will's car around the hotel. Sara's BMW was practically nondescript in that part of town.

"Thanks." He shoved another forkful of pancakes into his mouth.

She said, "Let's call in sick today."

His chewing slowed. He met her gaze.

"I want us to go away together," she said. "My cousin has a house on the Gulf we can use. Let's just get out of here. Leave town."

He swallowed. "That sounds nice."

"We can take the dogs and run on the beach every morning." She wrapped her arms around her waist. "And then we can go back to bed. And then we can eat lunch. And then we can go back to bed."

He gave her a forced grin. "That sounds really nice."

"Then let's do it. Right now."

"Okay," he agreed. "I'll drop you off at your place, then go run some errands."

Sara stopped pretending. "I'm not going to let you do it."

Will sat back in his chair. The nervous energy was gone. She watched it slowly leave his body. Now there was only the grief and sorrow that had broken her heart the day before.

"Will—"

He cleared his throat. The sound turned into a cough. His throat worked as he fought back tears. "She was just a student."

Sara bit her lip.

"She was walking to class one night, and he saw her, and he took her, and that was it. Her life was over." He put down his fork. "You know what was done to her. You saw the girl yesterday. He did the same thing to both of them."

Will's cell rang. He grabbed the phone out of his pocket. "Did you arrest him?" The devastation on his face told Sara the answer. "Where?" He listened a few seconds longer, then hung up. "Faith's waiting in the driveway."

"What happened?" Even as she said the words, Sara knew they were pointless. Another body had been found. Another life destroyed. Will's father had killed again.

Will stood. He grabbed his jacket off the back of the chair. He wouldn't look at her. She could practically hear his thoughts: He should've gone through with it. He should've taken his gun and gone to the hotel the minute he heard that his father was free.

He said, "Amanda wants you to come, too."

Sara didn't want to be a burden. Amanda had dragged her into this once before. "Do you want me there?"

"Amanda does."

"I don't care about Amanda. I only want to do what's best for you. Easiest for you."

Will stood in the doorway. He seemed about to say something profound, but then he reached down and retrieved her gym bag. "Try to hurry. I'll be outside."

July 15, 1975

James Ulster grabbed Amanda by the back of the neck. She felt like a kitten snatched by its scruff. Her arms went slack. Her toes lifted from the ground.

And then she remembered the revolver in her hand.

She snaked the gun around her side and pulled the trigger. Once. Twice. Three times. His body jerked as he was hit, but his grip only tightened. She pulled the trigger again. The muzzle flash singed Amanda's side. The gun was ripped from her hand. Ulster grunted. The muzzle was hot enough to burn his flesh. The gun clattered to the ground.

Amanda dropped to her knees, feeling blindly for the weapon. Ulster jerked her up by her arm. She felt like the bone was cracking. Her feet left the ground again. Her back slammed against the house. The breath was knocked out of her. She kicked and clawed as Ulster's hand wrapped around her neck. She dug her fingernails into his skin. His face contorted in rage. Amanda felt dizzy. There wasn't enough breath to fill her lungs.

"Let her go!" Evelyn screamed. She had her Kel-Lite crossed under her revolver. "Now!"

Ulster didn't believe her. He tightened his grip on Amanda.

Evelyn pulled the trigger. Ulster's grip loosened around Amanda's neck. Evelyn fired again. The bullet hit his leg. He dropped Amanda. His arm was bleeding. His side was bleeding. Still, he didn't go down.

"Don't move," Evelyn ordered. But Ulster didn't listen. He walked straight toward Evelyn. She pulled the trigger, but the shot went wild. He slapped the gun out of her hand. His fist swung. Evelyn stepped back, but not fast enough. His knuckles grazed her chin. Evelyn collapsed to the driveway.

"No!" Amanda screamed. She jumped on his back. Her fingernails scratched into his eyes. Instead of spinning around blindly, Ulster fell to his knees, rolled onto his back. His weight crushed Amanda. Breath huffed out of her chest. Still, she wrapped her arm around his neck, locked it tight with the other one. Choke hold. She'd seen it done before. It looked so easy, but no one was really fighting back. No one had over two hundred fifty pounds of muscle to leverage out of the hold. Ulster pulled Amanda's arms apart as easily as a child untying a bow. She fell back hard, her head smashing into the concrete drive.

She kicked and punched. Her blows were useless. He easily pinned her to the ground, trapping her arms at her sides, the weight of his body grinding her tailbone into the concrete. Blood soaked the front of Ulster's shirt, dripped from his mouth. "You must repent, sister." He pressed harder. He was pushing the air out of her body. "Repent to me your sins."

"No," Amanda whispered. "Please."

"Our Father."

She struggled, gulping for air.

"Our Father," he repeated, pressing harder.

Her ribs flexed back into her stomach. Something was tearing inside. She couldn't fight anymore. She could only look up at his cold, soulless eyes.

"Our Father," he said a third time, the beginning of the Lord's Prayer.

Amanda huffed out, "Father."

"Who art in Heaven."

"Who art ..." She couldn't get enough air to speak.

"Who art in Heaven."

"Who—" She pushed up against him, but his weight was like a mountain.

"Please," she panted. "Please."

Ulster lifted up just enough so her chest could draw breath.

"Who art—"

"Who ...," she tried. "Who art ..."

She felt her arms moving of their own volition. Ulster stopped her at first, pressing down his weight again, but then he understood. Carefully, he shifted back a fraction of an inch. Amanda slid out her arm, feeling her flesh scrape against the inseam of his pants. She pulled out the other arm, then clasped her hands together. Fingers laced one into the other. Palms tight. Thumbs outside.

Ulster stared at her intently. There was a smile on his lips. He rocked slowly, his pelvis grinding into hers. She felt as if her hipbone might crack in two. He leaned over more. He wanted to see her, wanted to enjoy the pain on her face.

She whispered, "Our Father ..."

"That's right." His voice slow, as if he was teaching a child. "Who art in Heaven."

"Who art in Heaven." She stopped, gasping for breath.

"Hallowed be—"

The words rushed out. "Hallowed be thy name."

"Thy kingdom come." He leaned over farther, staring down at her face. "Thy kingdom come?"

"Thy—"

Amanda didn't finish the prayer.

Instead, she drove her clenched hands as hard as she could straight up into his neck. Her knuckles smashed into cartilage and bone. His throat flexed. Something snapped. It sounded like a stick breaking.

Hyoid. Just like Pete had shown her.

Ulster dropped on top of her like a pile driver. Amanda tried to push him off. He groaned, but wouldn't budge. He was too heavy to shift. She had to crawl out from under him. His weight was suffocating her. She forced herself to not pass out. To not throw up. To not give in.

Amanda's palms scraped for purchase. She pressed her toes into the concrete. The going was slow, painstaking. Her heart was in her throat. Bile was in her mouth. And then, with one final push, she finally managed to wrench herself free.

Evelyn was still out cold. Her revolver lay in her open hand. The Kel-Lite had rolled to the side.

Amanda reached for the gun, but Ulster grabbed her ankle, jerking her back. Amanda kicked as hard as she could. She felt his nose break under her heel. He let go. Amanda scrambled, pulling herself to her knees, but he grabbed her again. His arms went around her waist. Amanda slammed back her head, going for his broken nose. He faltered, which gave her time to twist around, take aim, and drive her elbow straight into the soft meat of his throat.

The loud crack sounded like a shotgun blast.

Ulster's hands went to his neck. Air whistled into his mouth. Amanda slammed her elbow a second time. Another crack. She did it again. Ulster fell onto his side. He rolled onto his back, wheezing for air. Amanda pushed herself up again. Her arms ached. Her head was pounding. Her chest hurt. Her throat hurt. Everything hurt.

She managed to stand, clutching at the van so that she would not fall back down.

Ulster made a gurgling sound. Blood dribbled from his mouth and nose.

Amanda pressed her bare foot into his neck. The sensation was just as Pete had described, bubbles crackling against the arch of her foot. She leveraged her weight back and forth, watching Ulster's eyes widen in terror, wondering if hers had done the same when he was pressing the life out of her.

"Manda," Evelyn murmured. She was sitting up. Her lip was split. She had her hand to her face. Her jaw was so swollen that the lump showed through her fingers.

"Hey!" A patrolman ran around the van. He screeched to a stop when he took in the scene. "Jesus fucking Christ." His gun was drawn, though it hung limply out in front of him. "What the fuck did you broads do?"

"Amanda." Evelyn's voice was stilted, as if it hurt to talk. She said, "The girl."

Present Day

WEDNESDAY

News vans and reporters scurried like ants on the outer motor court of the Four Seasons. This wasn't just a hotel. High-priced lawyers and money managers filled the office spaces on the upper levels. The residence floors were packed with the rich and famous. Rap singers. TV reality stars. Fame-seeking socialites.

Crime scene tape had been strung along the marble fountain fronting Fourteenth Street. Someone noticed that Faith's turn signal was on. The reporters thronged forward. Will could hear their questions shouted through the closed window. What happened? Why are you here? Can you tell us who the victim is?

They would get the story soon enough. A woman murdered in a high-class hotel room. A paroled killer on the loose. There was not one part of the city this crime didn't touch, from the mayor's office to the Convention and Visitors Bureau.

Will had seen these stories spin out of control before. Every salacious detail would be discussed and analyzed. Rumors would be fed into the machine and regurgitated as fact. The obvious questions would be asked: Who did he kill? Why was he released? The Sunshine Law would be invoked. Files would be photocopied and couriered and Sam Lawson, Faith's ex who worked at the newspaper, would probably be on CNN before night fell.

"Crap," Faith mumbled, nosing her Mini up to the police barricade. The car shook as reporters jockeyed for position. She flashed her badge at the cop on duty.

"The BMW, too," Faith told him, pointing to Sara's car behind them.

The cop made a note on his clipboard, then pushed his way through the crowd to lift the barricade.

A reporter knocked on Faith's window. She mumbled, "Asshole," as she rolled the car forward. She hadn't said much on the ride over. Will didn't know if that was because she didn't know what to say or because Amanda was playing her usual game of hide the details.

Another body. Same M.O. His father nowhere to be found. The new victim was a prostitute. Will knew this with absolute certainty. It was his father's pattern. First a student, then a working girl. He didn't get rid of one unless he had another to take her place.

Will turned around to check for Sara. The BMW followed them inside the barricade. His Sig Sauer was still under her front seat. She wasn't going to stop him this time. Amanda could put fifty guards on Will and he'd still grab the gun and find his father and shoot him in the head.

Exactly as he should've done last night. This morning. Last week.

So many opportunities missed. His father had lived in this hotel for two months, and he'd somehow managed to come and go with no one being the wiser. He'd managed to abduct two girls. He'd managed to dump one at Techwood and murder another one in his hotel room. All while the police, hotel security, and undercover agents were supposedly watching his every move.

If that bastard could give them the slip, then so could Will. He was nothing if not his father's son.

Faith jerked up the handbrake as she parked behind Amanda's G-ride. Will got out of the car. Sara's BMW stopped in front of two Atlanta police cruisers. There were just as many cops on scene as reporters. He had to push past two uniformed patrolmen to open Sara's door for her. The cameras flashed as she got out of the car. She crossed her arms self-consciously. She was dressed in her yoga pants and his shirt. Hardly work attire. Will took the opportunity to reach in behind her and retrieve his gun from under the seat.

Except the gun wasn't there.

When he looked up, Sara was staring at him.

"Dr. Linton," Amanda said. "Thank you for coming."

Sara shut the car door. She locked it with the key fob, which she put in her shirt pocket. "Is Pete on the way?"

"No. He's testifying in court this morning." Amanda motioned for them to follow her inside. "I appreciate your coming on such short notice. It would behoove us all to get this body quickly removed."

A patrolman opened the side door. There was a whoosh as the air pressure changed. Will had never been inside the hotel before. The lobby was opulent in its excesses. Every surface was a different color of marble. A large staircase dominated the center of the room, splitting into two opposite sides as it reached the second floor. The treads were carpeted. The handrails were polished brass. The chandelier overhead looked as if a crystal factory had exploded.

The setting would've been impressive but for the fact that every shade and variety of police officer filled the lobby. Plainclothes division. Uniformed patrol. Special agents from the GBI. Even a couple of women from vice were there, their gold detective's shields looking incongruous against their skimpy attire.

Amanda told Faith, "Security is pulling footage from the last twenty-four hours. I need you to expedite that."

Faith nodded, heading toward the front desk.

Sara asked, "Have you identified the victim?"

"Yes." Amanda motioned over Jamal Hodge. "Detective, if you could please clear out all but the bare minimum of your people?"

"Yes, ma'am." He walked over to the crowd and raised his arms for attention. Will tuned out the man. He watched Amanda instead. She adjusted the sling on her shoulder as she gave orders to one of the hotel rent-a-cops.

Sara asked, "What is it?"

Will didn't answer. He scanned the lobby, trying to find a senior Atlanta Police officer. No Leo Donnelly. No Mike Geary, the captain in charge of this zone.

Amanda took over the case, Will realized. It didn't make sense. As far as the Atlanta Police Department knew, a dead prostitute had nothing to do with a kidnapped student. He asked Amanda, "What happened?"

Amanda indicated the rent-a-cop. He was in an expensive-looking charcoal suit, but the radio in his hand gave him away. "This is Bob McGuire, head of hotel security. He called it in."

Will shook the man's hand. McGuire was too young to be a retired cop, but he seemed fairly collected considering what had fallen into his lap. He led them toward the elevator, saying, "I got the call from the kitchen this morning. The room service girl said that he wasn't responding to her knock."

Amanda explained, "He's been adhering to a regular schedule."

The elevator doors opened. Will stood back to let Sara and Amanda on first.

McGuire said, "He's been staying here for two months." He waved a keycard over the panel, then pressed the button for the nineteenth floor. "We can track his movements in and out of the room through the software on the door lock. His schedule's been roughly the same since he got here. Room service at six in the morning, then the gym, then he goes back to his room, then he orders room service at noon." He tucked his hands into his pockets. "Once or twice a week, he uses our restaurant for dinner, or eats at the bar. Most nights, he orders room service at six o'clock. Then we don't hear from him until six the next morning."

Amanda noted, "He's keeping to his prison schedule."

Will glanced around the elevator car. The security camera was tucked into the corner. "How long have you been watching him?"

"Officially?" McGuire asked. "Just a few days." He told Amanda, "Your people have been doing most of the heavy lifting, but my folks have supplemented."

"Unofficially?" Will asked.

"Since he checked in. He's a strange man. Very off-putting physically. He never did anything overt, but he made people uncomfortable. And, frankly, the Presidential Suite is four thousand dollars a night. We normally try to find out who our higher-end clients are. I did a little poking around and realized that we needed to keep a closer eye on him."

Amanda asked, "Did anyone talk to him? Socialize with him?"

"As I said, he was off-putting. The hotel staff avoided him whenever possible. We never let the maids go up alone."

"What about other guests?"

"No one mentioned anything."

Will asked, "How did he pay for the room?" The man had been in prison. He wouldn't have a credit card.

McGuire explained, "His bank arranged everything. We're holding a hundred-thousand-dollar deposit against the room."

A bell dinged. The doors opened.

Will stepped aside, then followed them out of the elevator. Sara held his gaze for a few seconds. He nodded for her to go ahead of him.

McGuire said, "There are five other suites on his floor. The Presidential is in the corner. It's around twenty-two hundred square feet."

Three uniformed Atlanta Police officers stood at the end of the hallway. They were at least fifty feet away. The red exit sign glowed over their heads. The suite was directly across from the stairs.

McGuire led them down the hall. "Three of the suites were occupied. Entertainers. There's a concert in town. We arranged for them to be moved to our sister property. I can give you their information but—"

Amanda said, "I'd rather not waste time talking with lawyers."

Will felt a pain in his jaw, running down his neck. His teeth were clamped together. His shoulders tensed. He could hear his own breathing over the Muzak. The thick carpet was soft under his shoes. The walls were painted a deep brown that made the long hallway feel like a tunnel. Chandeliers hung at even intervals. There was a room service cart beside a closed door. No number on the room. The suites were probably the equivalent of three or four rooms. In movies, they always had Jacuzzi tubs and bathrooms the size of Will's house.

She wouldn't be in the tub. She wouldn't be in the bathroom. She would be on the mattress. She would be pinned down like a specimen in a science project.

Another victim. Another woman whose life was over because of a man whose DNA roiled inside of Will.

He had never stayed in a hotel suite before. He had never run on a beach. He had never flown in an airplane. He had never brought home a school report and watched his mother smile. The clay ashtray he'd made in kindergarten had been one of sixteen Mrs. Flannigan received on Mother's Day. All the Christmas gifts under the tree were labeled "for a girl" or "for a boy." The evening Will graduated high school, he'd looked out at the crowd of cheering families and seen only strangers.

Amanda stopped a few feet from the uniformed officers. "Dr. Linton, perhaps you should stay out in the hall for a moment?"

Sara nodded her acquiescence, but Will asked, "Why?"

Amanda stared up at him. She looked worse than she had the day before. Dark circles rimmed her eyes. Her lipstick was smeared.

"All right." For once, Amanda didn't argue. She continued down the hallway.

The cops looked bored with their assignment. Their thumbs were looped through their heavy utility belts. They stood with their legs wide apart to keep their backs from breaking under the weight of their equipment.

"Mimi," Amanda said to the female officer. "How's your aunt Pam?"

"Hating retirement." She indicated the room. "No one's been in or out."

Amanda waited for McGuire to open the door with his keycard. The green light flashed. There was a clicking sound. He held open the door. Sara and Amanda walked in, then Will.

McGuire said, "I'll be in the hall if you need me." There was a metal latch on the doorjamb. He swung it out to catch the door and keep it from locking.

"Well," Amanda said.

They stood in the foyer, looking into a room that was larger than Will's entire house. The curtains were open. Sunlight streamed in. The corner unit offered a panoramic view of Midtown. The Equitable building. Georgia Power. The Westin Peachtree Plaza.

And, in the distance, Techwood.

Two couches and four chairs were arranged around a fifty-two-inch flat-screen television. DVD player. VCR. CD player. There was a galley kitchen. A wet bar. Dining room seating for ten. A large desk with an Aeron chair. A half bath with a telephone mounted on the wall. The toilet paper was folded into a rose. The faucet was a gold-plated swan, its mouth opened to release a stream of water as soon as its wings were turned.

"This way," Amanda said. The door to the bedroom was half-closed. She used her foot to push it the rest of the way open.

Will breathed through his mouth. He expected to smell the familiar, metallic scent of blood. He expected to find a thin, blonde girl with vacant eyes and perfect fingernails.

What he found instead was his father.

Will's knees buckled. Sara tried to hold him up, but she wasn't strong enough. He slumped against the door. There was no sound in the room. Amanda's mouth was moving. Sara was trying to tell him something, but his ears wouldn't work. His lungs wouldn't work. His vision skewed. Everything took on a red tone, as if he was looking at the world through a veil of blood.

The carpet was red. The curtains. The sun coming through the windows—it was all red.

Except for his father.

He was on the bed. Lying on his back. Hands clasped together on his chest.

He had died in his sleep.

Will screamed in rage. He kicked the door, crushing the handle into the wall. He grabbed the floor lamp and threw it across the room. Someone tried to stop him. McGuire. Will punched him in the face. And then he collapsed to the floor as a baton pounded against the back of his knees. Two cops were on top of him. Three. Will's face was pushed into the carpet. A strong hand kept it there as his arm was wrenched around. A handcuff clamped around his wrist.

"Don't you dare!" Sara yelled. "Stop!"

Her words were like a slap. Will felt his senses come back. He realized what he was doing. That he had been completely and totally out of control.

And that Sara had seen it all.

"Officers," Amanda's tone held a steely warning. "Let him go. Immediately."

Will stopped struggling. He felt some of the pressure lessen. The female cop leaned down so that Will could see her face. Mimi. She asked, "Are we gonna be okay?"

Will nodded.

The key clicked into the handcuffs. His arm was freed. Slowly, they all climbed off him. Will didn't stand immediately. He turned his head to the carpet. He pressed his palms flat to the floor. He sat back on his heels. He was breathless. The sound of his blood pounded in his ears.

"Asshole." Bob McGuire's hand covered his nose. Blood seeped between his fingers.

Amanda said, "Mr. McGuire, I hope you'll excuse us?"

The man looked like he would prefer to kick Will in the teeth.

Mimi offered, "I'll get you some ice." She put her hand to McGuire's elbow and escorted him from the room. The two other cops followed.

"Well." Amanda let out a long sigh. "Dr. Linton, can you estimate time of death?"

Sara didn't move. She was looking at Will. She wasn't mad. She wasn't disgusted. There was a slight tremor to her body. He could tell she wanted to help him. Longed to help him. That she did not make him love her with a piercing clarity.

Will pushed his hands to the floor. He stood up. He straightened his jacket.

Amanda said, "The last time anyone saw him was approximately seven last night. He called room service to remove his tray. He put the breakfast card on the door."

Room service. Penthouse suites. Dying peacefully in his sleep.

"Dr. Linton?" Amanda said. "Time of death would be very helpful."

Sara was shaking her head even before Amanda finished her request. "I don't have the proper tools. I can't move the body until it's photographed. I don't even have gloves."

Amanda unzipped her purse. "The thermostat was set on seventy when the first unit arrived." She offered Sara a pair of surgical gloves. "I'm sure you can give us something."

Sara looked at Will again. He realized that she was waiting for his permission. He nodded, and she took the gloves. Her face changed as she walked over to the bed. He'd seen this happen many times before. She was good at her job. Good at separating who she was from what she had to do.

Will had witnessed enough preliminary exams to know what Sara was thinking. She noted the position of the body—he was lying prone on the mattress. She noted that the sheet and bedspread were neatly folded down at the foot of the bed. She noted that the victim was dressed in a white, short-sleeved T-shirt and white boxer shorts.

And that beside him on the table was a black velvet manicure kit.

The tools were neatly laid out: nail clippers, a tiny pair of scissors, a nail buffer, three types of metal files, an emery board, tweezers, a clear glass vial that held the white, crescent-shaped clippings of his father's fingernails.

Will had never seen the man in the flesh. His mugshot photo showed swollen features marred by dark bruises. Months after his arrest, a newspaper photographer had managed to snap a blurred image of him leaving the courthouse in shackles. Those were the only two photos Will knew of. There was no background information in his file. No one knew where he was from. No friends came forward. No parents. No neighbors claimed that he had always seemed so normal.

The AJC had been two newspapers back then—The Atlanta Journal and The Atlanta Constitution. Both editions covered the court proceedings, but there was no trial. His father had pleaded guilty to kidnapping, torture, rape, and murder. With the death penalty rendered illegal by the Supreme Court, the only enticement the prosecutor could offer in exchange for not having to prove his case at trial was life with the possibility of parole. That everyone assumed that possibility would never roll around was understood.

So, in the scheme of things, Will supposed his father was lucky. Lucky to miss the ultimate punishment. Lucky the parole board finally released him. Lucky to die on his own terms.

Lucky to kill one last time.

Sara began the examination with his face. That was where rigor always started. She tested the laxity of the jaw, pressed against the closed eyelids and mouth. Next, she checked the fingers, flexed the wrist. The nails glinted in the sunlight. They were trimmed down to the quick. The cuticle on his thumb had bled before he died.

Sara said, "My best guess—and it's only a guess—is that he died sometime within the last six hours."

Amanda didn't let her off that easily. "Care to hazard a cause of death?"

"Not really. Could be a heart attack. Could be cyanide. I won't know until I get him on the table."

"Surely, there's something else you can tell me about him?"

Sara was visibly annoyed by the question. Still, she answered, "He's in his mid-to-late sixties. He's well nourished, in good shape. His muscle tone is appreciative, even in rigor. His teeth are false, obviously penal-system quality. He has what looks like a scar on his chest. You can see it in the V-neck of his undershirt. It looks surgical."

"He had a heart attack a few years ago." Amanda frowned. "Unfortunately, they managed to save him."

"That might explain the trach scar on his neck." She indicated the metal bracelet on his wrist. "He's diabetic. I'm not going to move his clothes until after he's photographed, but I imagine we'll find injection sites on his abdomen and legs." She took off the gloves. "Is there anything else?"

Faith stood in the doorway. "I have something." She had a computer disc in her hand. She wouldn't look at Will, which told him that the victim's identity came as no surprise. She was a better liar than he'd thought. Or maybe not. At least he understood why she'd been so quiet on the drive over.

Amanda said, "We can watch it in the other room."

The three of them stood in a half circle as they waited for Faith to load the DVD player. Amanda was between Will and Sara. She took her BlackBerry out of her purse. Will thought at first that she was reading her emails, but it was easy to look over her shoulder. The screen was shattered like a spiderweb. He recognized the news site.

Amanda read the headline, " 'Recently paroled con dies in Midtown hotel room.' "

"They were hoping for somebody famous." Faith picked up the remote control. "Idiots."

"The story isn't dead yet." Amanda kept scrolling. "Apparently, a hotel employee tipped them off to a heavy police presence over the last few days." She told Will, "This is why we try to make friends."

"Here we go." Faith pointed the remote at the player. The security camera showed an empty hotel elevator. The recording was in color. Will recognized the gold-inlaid tile on the floor of the car. Faith fast-forwarded through the video, saying, "Sorry, it's not cued."

The lights on the elevator panel flashed, indicating the car was moving down to the lobby. Faith slowed the recording when the doors opened. A woman got onto the elevator. She was thin and tall with long blonde hair and a floppy white hat. She kept her head down as she entered the car. The hat brim covered most of her face. Just her chin showed before she turned around. "Working girl," Faith provided. "Hotel security doesn't know her name, but she's been here before. They recognize the hat."

Will checked the time stamp. 22:14:12. He'd been sleeping on the couch with Sara.

"She has a keycard," Amanda said, just as the woman swiped the card across the pad, the same as Bob McGuire had done. She pressed the button for the nineteenth floor. The doors closed. The woman faced the front of the car, showing the security camera the top of her hat, the back of her slinky, matching white dress. The elevator doors were solid wood. There was no mirrored reflection.

Amanda asked, "Did the lobby cameras pick up her face?"

"No," Faith said. "She's a pro. She knew where the cameras were." The woman got off the elevator. The doors closed. The car was empty again. "She stayed up here for half an hour before coming down again. I checked with APD vice. They say that's about the right amount of time."

Amanda said, "She's lucky she got away with her life."

Faith fast-forwarded the video again, then slowed it when the elevator doors opened. The woman entered the same as before, head tilted down, hat covering her face. She didn't need the keycard to go to the lobby. Her finger pressed the button. Again, she faced the doors, but this time, she reached up and adjusted her hat.

Will said, "Her fingernails weren't painted before."

"Exactly," Faith agreed. "I checked it four times before I came up here."

Will stared at the woman's hands. The nails were painted red, undoubtedly in Bombshell Max Factor Ultra Lucent. According to the crime scene report, it was his father's preferred color. Will said, "There's no nail polish by the bed. Just manicure stuff."

Faith suggested, "Maybe she brought her own?"

"That doesn't seem likely," Amanda told them. "He liked to control things."

Sara offered, "I'll check the other room."

Amanda told Faith, "Security says the girl's been in the hotel before. I want you to comb every second of video they have. Her face has to be on camera somewhere."

Faith left the room.

Amanda pulled a latex glove out of her purse. She didn't put it on, but used it as a barrier between her fingers as she opened the drawers on the desk. Pens. Paper. No Max Factor nail polish with the distinctive pointy white cap.

Amanda said, "This doesn't take two people."

Will checked the galley kitchen. Two keycards were on the counter. One was solid black, the other had a picture of a treadmill on it, probably for the gym. There was a stack of crisp bills. Will didn't touch the money, which he guessed to be around five hundred dollars, all in twenties.

"Anything?" Amanda asked.

Will went behind the wet bar. Swizzle sticks. Napkins. A martini shaker. A Bible with an envelope stuck between the pages. The book was old. The leather cover was worn off the corners, showing the cardboard underneath.

He told Amanda, "I need your glove."

"What is it?" She didn't hand him the glove. Instead, she wiped her palm on her skirt, then forced her hand into the latex. She opened the Bible.

The envelope lay flat against the page. It had obviously been in there for a while. The paper was old. The ink had worn off the round logo in the corner. The typewritten address had grayed with time.

Amanda started to close the Bible, but Will stopped her.

He leaned down, squinting hard to make out the address. Will had seen his father's name enough times to recognize the words. "Atlanta Jail" came just as easily. He'd used one or both in almost every report he'd ever written. The postmark was faded, but the date was clear. August 15, 1975.

He said, "This was mailed a month after I was born."

"So it appears."

"It's from a law firm." He recognized the scales of justice.

"Herman Centrello," she supplied.

His father's defense attorney. The man was a gun for hire. He was also the reason they were here. It was the threat of Centrello's superior courtroom performance that persuaded the Atlanta city prosecutor to offer the plea bargain of life with the possibility of parole.

Will said, "Open it."

In fifteen years, Will had only once seen Amanda's composure crack, and even then, it was more like a fissure. For a split second, she showed something akin to dread. And then just as quickly, the emotion was gone.

The envelope was glued into the spine. She had to turn it over like a page. The glue along the flap had dried long ago. She used her thumb and forefinger to press open the envelope. Will looked inside.

No letter. No note. Just faded ink where some of the words had rubbed off.

Amanda said, "Apparently, it's nothing more than a bookmark."

"Then why did he keep it all these years?"

"No luck." Sara was back. She told them, "No nail polish in the bathroom or the bedroom. I found his diabetic kit. His syringes are in a plastic disposal box. We'll have to have the lab cut it open, but from what I could tell, there's nothing in there that doesn't belong."

"Thank you, Dr. Linton." Amanda closed the Bible. She took out her BlackBerry again. "Will?"

He didn't know what else to do but continue searching the bar. He used the edge of his shoe to open the bottom cabinets. More glasses. Two ice buckets. The minibar was unlocked. Will used the toe of his shoe again. The fridge was full of vials of insulin, but nothing else. He let the door close.

There were at least two dozen liquor bottles on the shelves behind the bar. The mirror backing showed Will's reflection. He didn't look at himself, didn't want to fall down that rabbit hole of comparing himself to his father. He studied the colored labels instead, the shape of the bottles, the amber and gold liquids.

Which was why he noticed that one of the bottles listed at a slight angle. There was something underneath, shimmying it to the side.

He told Amanda, "Pick up this bottle." For once, she didn't ask him why. She took the bottle off the shelf. "It's a key."

Sara asked, "Is it for the minibar?"

Will checked the lock on the refrigerator. "No. It's too big."

Carefully, Amanda picked up the key by the edges. The head was stepped instead of round or angled. There was a number stamped into the metal.

Will said, "That's for a Schlage factory lock."

Amanda sounded perturbed. "I have no idea what that means."

"It's a heavy-duty deadbolt." Will went out into the hallway. The cops were gone, but McGuire was still there. He held a bag of ice to his nose.

Will said, "I'm sorry about before."

McGuire's curt nod did not indicate forgiveness.

Will asked, "What door in this hotel opens with an actual metal key?"

He took his time lowering the bag of ice, sniffing back blood. "The keycards —"

Amanda interrupted him, holding up the key. "It's to a Schlage deadbolt. Heavy duty. What door in your hotel does this open?"

McGuire wasn't stupid. He got over himself fast. "The only locks like that are in the sub-basement."

Amanda asked, "What's down there?"

"The generators. The mechanicals. The elevator shafts."

Amanda headed toward the elevators. She told McGuire, "Radio your security team. Tell them to meet us down there."

McGuire jogged to keep up. "The main elevators stop in the lobby. You have to go to the second floor in the service elevator, then use the emergency exit stairs behind the spa."

Amanda jabbed the button. "What else is on that floor?"

"Treatment rooms, a nail suite, the pool." The doors opened. He let Amanda on first. "The stairs to the sub-basement are behind the gym."

July 15, 1975

"Amanda," Evelyn repeated.

Amanda stared down at Ulster. Her foot was still jammed into his neck. With the slightest pressure, she could crush his windpipe.

"Amanda," Evelyn said. "The girl."

The girl.

Amanda stepped back. She told the patrolman, "Take him." The man took out his cuffs. He called dispatch on his shoulder mic, sounding as scared as Amanda had felt ten minutes ago.

She wasn't afraid now. The steeliness was back. The fury. The anger. She headed toward the house.

"Wait." Evelyn put her hand on Amanda's arm. The lower half of her face was swollen. It obviously hurt to talk, but she whispered, "There could be someone else."

Not another girl. Another killer.

Amanda found her revolver on the ground. The wooden grip was cracked. She opened the cylinder. One bullet. She looked at Evelyn, who checked her own revolver and held up four fingers. Five bullets between them. That was all they had.

That was all they needed.

The front door was unlocked. Amanda reached in with her hand and turned on the switch. A single bulb hung from an old fixture in the ceiling. The house was shotgun style, one story with a front door that lined up to the back. There were two chairs in the front room. A Bible was open on one of them. A silver bowl of water was on the floor. She was reminded of Easter church services. The women would bring bowls of water and wash the men's feet. She'd washed Duke's every year since her mother died.

The distant wail of a siren broke the silence. Not just one siren. Two. Three. More than she could decipher.

Evelyn joined Amanda as she walked down the hall. The kitchen was straight ahead. Two doors were on their right. One on the left. All closed.

Evelyn indicated the first door. She gripped her revolver in her hand. She nodded that she was ready.

They stood on either side of the closed door. Amanda reached down and turned the knob. She pushed open the door. Quickly, she reached in and flipped up the light switch. A floor lamp came on. There was a metal bed in the middle of the room. The mattress was soiled. Threads jutted up. Broken threads. A washstand. A sink. A chair. A bed table.

On the table was a pair of nail clippers. Cuticle nips. Buffer. Three types of metal files. An emery board. Tweezers. Red Max Factor nail polish with a pointy white cap. A glass vial filled with the crescent-shaped clippings of women's fingernails.

Jane Delray.

Mary Halston.

Kitty Treadwell.

Lucy Bennett.

Filthy rooms. Cracked plaster walls. Bare bulbs in the ceiling. Animal droppings on the floor. The stench of blood and terror.

This house was where he'd kept them.

Evelyn gave a low hiss for her attention. She nodded toward the next door. Amanda saw the patrolman enter the front room. She didn't wait for him. They did not need his help.

She stood to the side of the closed door and turned the knob. The light was already on in the room. Washstand. Sink. Manicure kit. Red polish. Another glass vial of nail clippings.

The girl was slumped against the headboard. Blood spilled in a steady stream down her abdomen. Pink foam bubbled from her mouth. Her hand was wrapped around the large knife in her chest.

"Don't!" Amanda lurched forward, dropping to her knees beside the bed. She covered the girl's hand with her own. "Don't take it out."

Evelyn yelled to the patrolman, "Call an ambulance! She's still alive!"

The girl's throat made a sucking sound. Air whistled around Amanda's hand. The blade was angled to the left, piercing the lung, possibly the heart. The knife was huge, the kind of weapon hunters used to skin their kill.

"Ha ...," the girl breathed. Her body was shaking. Torn threads hung from holes around her tattered lips. "Ha ..."

"It's okay," Amanda soothed, trying to keep the knife steady as she peeled away the girl's fingers.

Evelyn asked, "Is she having a seizure?"

"I don't know."

The girl's hand dropped. The fingers twitched against the mattress. Her breath was stale, almost sour. Amanda's muscles burned as she gripped the handle of the knife, trying desperately to hold it in place. No matter what she did, blood poured steadily from the wound.

"It's all right," Amanda mumbled. "Just hold on a little bit longer."

The girl tried to blink. Pieces of eyelid stuck to her brow. Her arm reached out, fingers flexing as she tried to point to the open door.

"That's right," Amanda felt tears streaming down her face. "We're going to take you out of here. He's not going to hurt you anymore."

She made a noise, a sound between a breath and a word.

"We'll get you out of here."

Again, she made the sound.

"What is it?" Amanda asked.

"Laa ..." The girl breathed. "Vah ..."

Amanda shook her head. She didn't understand.

Evelyn got down beside her. "What is it, sweetheart?"

"Laa," she repeated. "Laa ... vah ..."

"Lover?" Amanda asked. "Love?"

Her head shook in a trembling nod. "Him ..."

Her breath stopped. Her body went limp as the life drained out of her. Amanda couldn't hold her up anymore. Gently, she let the girl fall back onto the bed. Her eyes took on a blank stare. Amanda had never seen another person die before. The room got cold. A breeze chilled her to the bone. It felt as if a shadow hovered above them, then just as quickly, it was gone.

Evelyn sat back on her knees. She spoke quietly. "Lucy Bennett."

"Lucy Bennett," Amanda repeated.

They stared at the poor creature. Her face. Her torso. Her arms and legs. The horrors of the last year were writ large across her body.

"How could she love him?" Amanda asked. "How could she ..."

Evelyn used the back of her hand to wipe away tears. "I don't know."

Amanda stared into the dead girl's eyes. She had seen her through the window just moments ago. The image flashed into Amanda's mind like a scene from a horror movie. The girl on the bed. Her hand at her chest. It was a knife she had been holding. Amanda realized that now.

The sound of the sirens got louder.

"House is clear." The patrolman came up behind them. "What did you—" He saw the body. His hand slapped to his mouth as he ran from the room, retching.

Evelyn said, "At least we were here for her."

Tires screeched in the street. Blue lights flashed.

"Maybe we brought her ... I don't know. Comfort?"

Amanda said, "We were too late to save her."

"We found her," Evelyn said. "At least we found her. At least the last few minutes of her life, she was free."

"It's not enough."

"No," Evelyn said. "It'll never be enough."

The sirens wound down as the cruisers pulled up. They heard talking outside; gruff voices barking orders, the usual palaver of men taking charge.

And something else.

Evelyn obviously heard it, too.

Still, Amanda asked, "What's that noise?"

Present Day

SUZANNA FORD

She knew what the noise was now. The elevators rushing up and down. She heard the wind whistling like a train—up and down, down and up—as the doctor cut the threads with a pair of office scissors.

“You’re going to be okay,” the woman said. She was obviously in charge. She’d been the first to come to Suzanna’s side. The only one who wasn’t afraid of what she had seen. The other guys hung back. She could hear their breathing like steam pushing out of an iron. And then the doctor told one to call an ambulance. Another to get a bottle of water. Another to get a blanket. Another to find some scissors. They jumped to obey, running off so fast that Suzanna could feel the ghosts of their presence long after she could no longer hear their sneakers pounding against the floor.

“You’re safe,” the doctor said. She put her hand to Suzanna’s head. She was pretty. Her green eyes were the first thing Suzanna saw. They looked at her down the blade of the scissors as she carefully snipped apart the threads. She’d covered Suzanna’s eyes with her hand so that the light would not blind her. Her touch was so light when she cut apart Suzanna’s lips that she’d barely felt the metal grazing her skin.

“Look at me. You’re going to be okay,” the woman said. Her voice was steady. She was so damn certain that Suzanna believed her.

And then she saw the man. Hulking. Lurking. He looked different. Younger. But it was still the same guy. Still the same monster.

Suzanna started screaming. Her mouth opened. Her throat scratched. Her lungs shook. She screamed as loud as she could. The noise wouldn’t stop. She screamed even when the man left. She screamed over the doctor’s soothing voice. She screamed when the paramedics came. She didn’t stop screaming until the doctor stuck the needle in.

The drug rushed through her body.

Immediate relief.

Her brain calmed. Her heart slowed. She could breathe again. Taste again. See again. There was no part of her that did not feel it. Her hands, her fingers, her toes, all tingled from the rush.

Release. Salvation. Oblivion.

And Zanna was in love all over again.

Present Day

WEDNESDAY

Sinatra crooned softly through the speakers in Amanda's Lexus, but Will could only hear Suzanna Ford's screams. He had been so relieved to find the girl alive. He'd wanted to weep as Sara freed the girl. His father had hurt her. He'd tried to destroy her. But Will had stopped him. He'd won. He'd finally beaten the old man.

And then Suzanna had taken one look at Will and seen James Ulster come back to life.

He leaned his head into his hand as he stared at the passing cars. They were on Peachtree Road, stuck in the patch of traffic near one of the many strip malls.

Amanda turned down the volume on the radio. Sinatra's voice mellowed even more. She put her hand back on the wheel. The other rested in the sling that was strapped around her shoulder and waist.

She said, "It's supposed to get cold this weekend."

Her throat sounded raw, probably from talking nonstop on her BlackBerry for the last twenty minutes. Hotel security. The Atlanta Police Department. Her own agents at the GBI. No one was going to skate on missing the fact that Ulster's morning trips to the gym were simply an excuse for him to gain access to the stairs that led to the sub-basement. How many times had he gone down there to hurt her? How many opportunities to stop him had been missed?

The girl had been held at least a week. She was dehydrated. Starved. Mutilated. God knows what else.

Amanda said, "Of course, you can't trust the weatherman. Never could."

Will still didn't answer.

The car accelerated as they drove past Amanda's condo. The Regal Park complex was nice, but paled in comparison to its neighbors. They were in the Buckhead fingerbowl. Habersham Road, Andrews Drive, Peachtree Battle—residences on these streets started at two million dollars and jumped sharply north. The area contained the most expensive real estate in the city. The zip code was listed among the top ten wealthiest in the country.

"We could use some rain."

Will looked at the side-view mirror as they approached the heart of Buckhead. An Atlanta PD cruiser was following them. Amanda hadn't told him why and Will couldn't bring himself to ask her. His breathing was shallow. His palms were clammy. There was no explanation for his feelings, just that he knew deep in his soul that something bad was about to happen.

Amanda slowed the car. Horns blared as she took an illegal turn onto West Paces Ferry Road. Her lips parted, but only to take a breath.

He waited for her to say something more about the weather, but her mouth remained closed, her eyes on the road ahead of them.

Will stared out the window again. The dread was making him feel sick. She'd already surprised him once today. It was a cruel thing to do. The shock had almost killed him. What else did she have planned?

Amanda pointed to a sixties-style house with fake Tara columns. The Governor's Mansion. "A tornado cut straight through here a few months before you were born. Took the roof off, cut through Perry Homes."

Will wasn't going to take the bait. "What will happen to his body?"

She didn't ask whom he meant. "No one will claim him. He'll be buried in a pauper's grave."

"He has money."

"Do you want it?"

"No." He didn't want anything from his father. Will would live on the streets again before he took a dime of the man's blood money.

Amanda slowed down for another turn. Will finally asked the question. "Where are we going?"

She signaled for the turn. "Don't you know?"

He studied the street sign. The X in the middle gave it away. Tuxedo Road. They were in the wealthiest part of the wealthiest section. Two million dollars would probably be just enough to cover property taxes for one estate.

"No?" she asked.

Will shook his head.

She made the turn. The car traveled several more yards before she said, "Your juvenile records are sealed."

"I know."

"You don't have your father's name."

"Or my mother's." Will loosened the knot in his tie. He couldn't get enough air. "That reporter with the AJC. Faith's ex-boyfriend. He called you—"

"Because I worked on the original case." Amanda glanced at him. "I'm the one who put your father in jail the first time."

"No, you didn't. Butch Bonnie and—"

"Rick Landry." She braked for a steep curve. "They were the homicide detectives. I was in what was euphemistically called Vagina Crimes. If it went into a vagina or came out of one, that was my case." She glanced over again, but only so she could enjoy his reaction. "Evelyn and I did all the work. Butch and Landry took all the credit. Don't be so shocked. It was a common occurrence. I hazard to say it's still going on."

Will couldn't answer even if he wanted to. It was too much to take on board. Too much information. Instead, he stared at the mansions rolling by. Castles. Mausoleums. Finally, he managed, "Why didn't you tell me?"

"Because it didn't matter. It was just another case. I've worked on lots of cases over the years. I don't know if you've noticed, but I've been doing this job an awfully long time."

He unbuttoned his collar. "You should've told me."

She was honest for once. "I probably should've told you a lot of things."

The car slowed again. She turned on her blinker and pulled into a long driveway. A Tudor-style house stretched out the length of half a football field, the front entrance peering down a rolling green lawn twice as long as the house was wide. The turf was crisscrossed in a checkered pattern. Azaleas and hosta spilled in rings around the tall oaks.

Will asked, "Who lives here?"

Amanda ignored the question as she pulled up to the closed gate. The scrollwork was painted a gloss black that matched the brick and wrought-iron fence ringing the property. She pressed the intercom button on the security panel.

A full minute passed before a woman's voice said, "Yes?"

"It's Amanda Wagner."

Static came through the intercom, then the sound of a long buzz. The gate started to swing open.

Amanda mumbled, "Swell digs," as she drove up the curving driveway.

"Who lives here?" Will repeated.

"You really don't recognize the place?"

Will shook his head, but there was something familiar about the house. The rolling green hill—tumbling down headfirst, grass stains streaking his pants.

The driveway laced across the front of the house in a gentle arc. Amanda pulled into the circular drive. A large fountain was in the center. Water slapped against a concrete urn. Amanda parked the Lexus parallel to the heavy wooden front doors. They were oversized—at least twelve feet tall—but fit with the scale of the building.

Will checked over his shoulder. The APD cruiser was thirty yards down, hanging back at the end of the driveway. Exhaust trailed from its tailpipe.

Amanda adjusted the sling on her arm. "Button your collar and fix your tie." She waited until he complied, then got out of the car.

Will's shoes crunched on the pea gravel driveway. Water splashed from the fountain. He looked down the vista of the front yard. Had he rolled down that hill? His mind could only recall fragments. None of them felt happy.

"Let's go." Amanda held her purse by the straps as she walked up the front steps. The door opened before she could ring the bell.

An older woman stood in the shadow of the door. She was the prototypical Buckhead Betty—extremely thin in the way of all wealthy women, with a tight face that had obviously been stretched back onto her skull. Her makeup was thick. Her hair was stiff with hair spray. She wore a red skirt with hose and high heels. Her white silk blouse had tiny pearl buttons at the wrist. A red cardigan was draped around her narrow shoulders.

She didn't bother with formalities. "He's waiting for you in his office."

The foyer was almost as large as the lobby of the Four Seasons. Another wide staircase. Another two-story entrance. Dark wooden beams arched into the white plaster ceiling. The chandelier was wrought iron. The furniture was sturdy-looking. The Oriental carpets showed a mixture of dark blues and burgundies.

"This way," the woman said, leading them down a long corridor that ran the width of the house. Their footsteps echoed on the slate tiles. Will couldn't help but look into each room they passed. He felt like a lightbulb kept flashing on in his head. The dining room with its large mahogany table. The delicate china hanging on the walls in the front parlor. The game room with its billiard table that Will had never been allowed to touch.

They finally stopped at a closed door. She turned the knob, opening it as she knocked. "They're here."

"They?" Henry Bennett stood from his desk. He was impeccably dressed, his blue suit tailored to his body. His mouth opened, then closed. He shook his head, as if to clear his vision.

Will almost did the same. He hadn't seen his uncle in almost thirty years. Henry was just out of law school when Lucy was murdered. He'd tried to keep a connection with his sister's only child, but by law an unmarried man could not adopt an infant. Henry had lost interest by the time Will turned six, which put Will right at the age when no one wanted him. Even Henry. Will had never laid eyes on his uncle again.

Until now.

And he had no idea what he was supposed to say.

Apparently, neither did Henry. "What the—" He was visibly angry. His mouth twisted in disgust as he asked Amanda, "What game are you playing?"

Yet again, Will felt a cold sweat come on. He looked down at the floor, wishing he could disappear. If Amanda thought this was going to be a happy homecoming, she was dead wrong.

"Wilbur?" Henry prodded.

Amanda took over. "Hank, I need to ask you some questions."

"It's Henry," he corrected. He obviously didn't like surprises, just as he obviously did not like Amanda. He couldn't even look at her.

Will cleared his throat. He told his uncle, "I'm sorry that we showed up like this."

Henry stared at him. Will felt an odd sense of déjà vu. Even after all these years, Henry shared similar features with his dead sister. Same mouth. Same high cheekbones. He had all of her secrets, too. All the stories about her childhood, her parents, her life.

And Will had a thin file that told him nothing more than that Lucy Bennett had been brutally murdered.

"Well," the Buckhead Betty said. "This is awkward." She extended her hand to Will. "I'm Elizabeth Bennett. Like in Austen, only older." Her smile was as practiced as the joke. "I suppose I'm your aunt."

Will didn't know what else to do but shake her hand. Her grip was firmer than he expected. "Will Trent."

She raised an eyebrow, as if the name surprised her.

Amanda asked, "How long have you been married?"

"To Henry?" She laughed. "Too long." She turned to her husband, saying, "Let's not be rude, sweetheart. These people are our guests."

Something passed between them, the sort of muted, private exchange that old married couples hone over the years.

"You're right." Henry pointed to the two chairs in front of his desk. "Sit down, boy. Would you like a drink? I need a drink."

"I'm fine," Amanda said. Instead of sitting in front of the desk, she sat on the couch. As usual, she stayed on the edge of the cushion, not leaning back. The leather was old. It creaked under her slight weight.

"Wilbur?" Henry asked. He was standing beside a cart with a full bar.

"No, thank you." Will sat beside Amanda on the couch. The frame was so low that he could easily rest his elbows on his knees. His leg wanted to shake. He felt nervous, like he'd done something wrong.

Henry dropped a piece of ice into a glass. He picked up a bottle of scotch and unscrewed the cap.

Elizabeth sat down in the matching leather chair. Like Amanda, she sat on the edge of the seat, back straight. She opened a silver box on the side table. She took out a cigarette and lighter. Will couldn't remember the last time he'd been around a smoker. The house was large enough to absorb the smell, but the pungent odor of burning tobacco filled his nostrils as the woman lit the cigarette.

"Now." Henry pulled over one of the chairs from his desk. "I assume you came here for a reason. Is it money? I have to warn you, all my cash is tied up right now. The market's been volatile."

Will would've preferred a knife in his groin. "No. I don't want your money."

Amanda said, "James Ulster is dead."

Henry's lips pursed. He got very still. "I'd heard he got out."

"Two months ago," Amanda confirmed.

Henry leaned back in his chair. He crossed his leg over his knee. His glass rested lightly on his palm. He smoothed out the arm of his suit jacket. He said, "Wilbur, I know that despite Ulster's terrible actions, he was still your father. Are you holding up?"

"Yes, sir." Will had to loosen his tie again. The air was stifling. He wanted to leave, especially when the room turned silent. No one seemed to know what to say.

Elizabeth took a deep drag off her cigarette. There was an amused smile on her lips, as if she was enjoying their discomfort.

"Well," Henry said. "As I said, your father was a very bad man. I think we're all relieved to learn of his demise."

Will nodded. "Yes, sir."

Elizabeth tapped the cigarette against the ashtray. "And how is your life, young man? Are you married? Do you have children?"

Will felt a tingling in his arm. He wondered if he was having a heart attack. "I'm doing well."

"What about you, Hank?" Amanda asked. "I saw when you made partner. Three years out of law school and you rocketed to the top of the firm. Old Treadwell certainly took care of you."

Henry finished his scotch. He put the glass on the table. "I'm retired now."

Amanda spoke to Elizabeth. "It must be lovely having him home."

She held the cigarette to her lips. "I cherish every moment."

Another muted exchange, this time between Amanda and Elizabeth Bennett.

Will reached up to unbutton his shirt collar. Amanda touched his elbow to stop him. Elizabeth took another drag off her cigarette. A clock ticked somewhere in the house. The water from the driveway fountain continued its rhythmic sound.

"So." Henry's fingers tapped against his knee. "Wilbur." His fingers stopped tapping. He looked down at his hand. "Was there anything else? I was about to head off to the club.”

Amanda asked, “How old would Lucy be now?”

Henry kept staring at his hand. “Fifty-three?”

“Fifty-six,” Will said.

Henry straightened his leg. He reached into his pants pocket and pulled out a pair of fingernail clippers. “Wilbur, I was thinking about your mother the other day.” He swiveled the handle. “I suppose news of Ulster’s parole put her in my mind.”

Will felt that familiar clamp start to tighten around his chest.

“Lucy had this friend. Not a pretty girl, but very demure.” Henry lined up the clipper to his thumbnail and pressed the handles together. “I’ll hazard Lucy was a bad example for her. That’s neither here nor there.” He placed the cut fingernail on the table beside the ashtray and started on the next nail. “At any rate, the summer I was home from school, I would hear them giggling in Lucy’s room, listening to records. One day I went in to see what all the racket was, and caught them dancing in front of a mirror, singing into their hairbrushes.” He put the second nail by the first. “Isn’t that silly?”

Will watched him clip the nail of his middle finger. Henry flinched as he cut too close. Still, he managed to remove the tip in one piece. He put the crescent-shaped nail beside the others. When he looked up from his work, he seemed surprised that they were watching him. “I suppose that’s not an interesting anecdote. I just assumed you’d want to know something about your mother.”

Amanda asked, “Do you remember Evelyn Mitchell?”

He grunted at the name. “Vaguely.”

“You know, Evelyn was determined to track Ulster’s money.” She told Will, “This was before the Miami cocaine heyday when the government started requiring banks to report large deposits.”

Henry tucked the clippers back into his pocket. “Is there a point to this?”

Amanda picked up her purse from the floor. The bag was huge. She carried the world on her shoulder. “Ulster lived in a slum, but he had enough money to hire the top defense attorney in the Southeast. It raised some questions. At least among some of us.”

Henry’s tone was arrogant. “Again, I don’t know what this has to do with me.”

“Ulster had a savings account at C&S bank. We knew a gal there. She told us he had less than twenty dollars. He didn’t use a dime of it to pay his lawyer.”

Henry said, “He owned property.”

“Yes, a house in Techwood that he sold in 1995 for four million dollars.” She unzipped her purse. “He was the last holdout. I’m sure the city was pleased when he finally accepted.”

Henry sounded annoyed. “A lot of people made money off the Olympics.”

“Ulster certainly did.” Amanda took a latex glove out of her purse. As usual, she wiped her palm on her skirt. With her arm in a sling, it was more difficult to push her fingers into the latex, but she managed to pull on the glove. And then she reached into her purse again and pulled out his father’s Bible.

Henry laughed when she placed the book on the coffee table. “Are we going to pray for Ulster’s soul?”

Amanda opened the Bible. “Here’s your mistake, Hank.”

He studied the envelope. One shoulder went up in a shrug. “So?”

"This is addressed to James Ulster at the Atlanta Jail." She pointed to the name. "And this logo says Treadwell-Price. Your law firm."

Will was past the point where he could be surprised by Amanda's lies. Less than an hour ago, she'd told him that the letter was from his father's defense attorney.

"So?" Henry shrugged his shoulder again. "There's nothing inside."

Amanda asked, "Isn't there?"

"No, there's not." He seemed very sure of himself. "Obviously, I wrote him a letter giving him a piece of my mind. The man murdered my sister. You can't prove otherwise."

"I can prove what a lazy pig you are."

He gave her a sharp look. "Where do you—"

"You gave this envelope to your girl to type."

He glanced at his wife, but Elizabeth was staring at Amanda. She was smiling again, but there was no warmth in her expression.

Amanda asked, "Do you see your name typed above the Treadwell-Price logo?" She turned the Bible so Henry could see it. "That's what you're supposed to do when you send out a business correspondence. They teach you that in secretarial school."

"My secretary passed away years ago."

"I'm sorry for your loss." She turned the Bible back around. "The thing about those old typewriters—and you wouldn't know this—is the rollers were heavy. If you weren't careful, you could pinch your fingers between them."

Henry straightened the nail clippings on the table. He used the tips of his fingers to move them around. "Again, I ask for your point."

"The point is, you had to line up the envelope just right so the address wouldn't come out crooked. Sometimes you had to twist the envelope back and forth between the rollers to get it straight. It's almost like an old printing press, where you turn the screw to press the ink onto the sheet of paper. Do you still use a fountain pen?"

Henry froze. He finally seemed to get it.

"The ink wasn't dry when you put the check inside." Amanda carefully pinched open the paper. "So, when your girl pressed the envelope between those two heavy rollers, the ink on the check transferred to the inside of the envelope. This envelope." She smiled. "Your name. Your signature. Your money paid to the order of Herman Centrello, the defense attorney working for the man who murdered your sister."

Henry took out his nail clippers again. "That's hardly a smoking gun."

"He kept it all these years," Amanda said. "But Ulster was like that, wasn't he?"

"How should I know what—"

"He didn't care about the money. It was a means to an end. He lived to control people. I bet every time he opened this Bible, all he could think about was how easily one word to the right snitch, one phone call to the right lawyer, could turn your world upside down."

"You have no proof that—"

"You licked the envelope flap to seal the letter, didn't you, Hank? I don't imagine you'd let your girl do that for you. She might wonder why you're sending such a sizable check to another law firm, care of the man looking to be sent away for murdering your sister.” She smiled. “It must’ve galled you to have to lick your own envelope. How many times has that happened over the years?”

Henry looked frightened, then angry. “You don’t have my DNA to compare.”

“Don’t I?” Amanda leaned forward. “Were you ever scratched, Hank? Did Jane scratch you on the arm or chest while you were strangling her?”

He stood up so fast the chair fell over. “I’d like for you to leave now. Wilbur, I’m sorry you’ve entangled yourself with this—” He cast about for a word. “Lunacy.”

Will unbuttoned his collar. The room was suffocating.

Amanda took off the glove. “You worked out a deal with Ulster, didn’t you, Hank? He got what he wanted. You got what you wanted.”

“I’m calling the police.” He walked to his desk. His hand rested on the phone. “Out of deference to Wilbur, I’m giving you one last opportunity to leave.”

“All right.” Amanda took her time standing. She straightened her sling. She lugged her purse onto her shoulder. But she didn’t head directly for the door. First, she stopped by Henry’s overturned chair. She took the fingernail clippings off the side table.

Henry demanded, “What are you doing?”

“I always wondered about Jane. She wasn’t killed like the other girls. She didn’t have the marks on her body. She was strangled and beaten. You tried to make it look like a suicide, but you were too stupid to know that we could tell the difference.”

Henry didn’t speak. He eyed the fingernails in Amanda’s hand.

“Jane was telling anyone who would listen about the missing girls. So you used Treadwell’s name to pull some strings down at the station house. You thought Jane would be afraid of the police.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“You’ve never understood women, have you, Hank? All you did was piss Jane off and make her talk more.” Amanda opened her hand. The fingernails fell to the carpet.

Henry nearly jumped across the desk. He caught himself at the last minute, telling his wife, “Pick those up. Immediately.”

Elizabeth seemed to debate her answer. “Oh, I don’t think so, Henry. Not today.”

“We’ll talk about this later.” He angrily punched the numbers on the phone. “I’m calling the police.”

“They’re right outside,” Amanda told him. “The envelope is enough to arrest you. I know a gal at the lab who’s just dying to get her hands on your DNA.”

“I told you to leave.” Henry hung up the receiver and picked it back up again. Instead of dialing three digits, he dialed ten. He was calling his lawyer.

Elizabeth said, “You’re nothing like him, you know?”

She wasn’t talking to Amanda or Henry. She was talking to Will.

“There’s a kindness about you,” she said. “James was terrifying. He didn’t have to speak, or move, or even breathe. Just being in his presence was like staring into the pit of hell.”

Will stared at the ugly shape of her mouth.

“He said he wanted to save them. Funny how none of them actually lived up to his promise.” Elizabeth inhaled deeply from the cigarette. “He gave Lucy a chance, at least. A chance to do something good, to bring something pure into the world.”

Will asked, “What are you saying?”

“Girls don’t matter. They never matter.” Her red lipstick had wicked into the deep lines around her mouth. “But you, handsome boy. You were saved from James. Saved from his brutality. His madness. You were our salvation. I hope you’ve earned it.”

Will watched her round off the ash of her cigarette in the ashtray. Her nails were long, painted in a flame red that matched her skirt and sweater.

Amanda said, “They were working together, weren’t they?”

“Not like you’re thinking,” she answered. “Yes, Hank had some fun, but I’m sure you’ve noticed that he doesn’t like to get his hands dirty.”

Henry ordered, “Shut up. Right now.”

She ignored him, telling Will, “He didn’t really want you, but he didn’t want anyone else to have you, either.” She paused. “I’m sorry about that. I really am.”

“I’m warning you, Elizabeth.” Henry’s voice was terse. Sweat rolled down the side of his face.

She continued to ignore her husband, staring at Will with what could only be described as a sinister smile. “He’d get you from the children’s home and bring you here for a day, two days at a time. I would hear you downstairs playing—inasmuch as a child can play without touching anything. Sometimes, I would hear you laugh. You loved rolling down that hill. You’d do it for hours. Down and up again, laughing the whole time. I would start to feel attached to you, and then Henry would take you away, and I was alone again.”

“I don’t—” Will had to stop to catch his breath. “I don’t remember you.”

She held the cigarette to her mouth. Her lipstick ringed the filter. “You wouldn’t. I only saw you once.” She gave a soft laugh. “The other times I was tied up.”

The tinny sound of a woman’s voice came through the telephone receiver in Henry’s hand. He stood holding it from his ear, staring at his wife.

Elizabeth told Will, “It could’ve just as easily been me, you know. I could’ve been your mother. I could’ve—”

Amanda hissed, “Shut up, Kitty.”

She blew out a stream of smoke. The tendrils swirled up into her thin blonde hair. “Bitch, was I talking to you?”

July 15, 1975

There was definitely a noise. A banging sound. Tapping. Amanda wasn't sure. The house was full of men tromping around in heavy shoes, yelling across the rooms. The attic stairs were pulled down. Someone was checking the crawl space. They could see the beam of a Kel-Lite through the planks in the hardwood floor.

Amanda stood in the hallway. "Shut up!" she yelled. "Everyone just shut up."

The men stared at her, not quite knowing what to do.

Amanda heard the noise again. It was coming from the kitchen.

Evelyn pushed past the crowd, fighting to get to the back of the house.

"Hey!" one of them complained.

Amanda followed her into the kitchen. The cabinets were metal. The white laminate countertop had a gold swirl pattern. The appliances dated back to the thirties. The overhead light was a single bulb, the same as in the other rooms.

"Do you hear it?" Evelyn kept her jaw tight. The lump was dark red now, taking up the lower half of her face.

Amanda closed her eyes and listened. There was no banging. No tapping. Nothing. Finally, she shook her head. Evelyn let out a long sigh.

The men in the house had lost their patience. They started talking in low voices that got louder as more of their compatriots arrived on the scene. The front door was wide open. Amanda could see into the street. An ambulance had arrived. The medic jumped out of the back and headed toward the house. A patrolman stopped him and pointed toward the driveway.

James Ulster was still alive. She could hear him moaning through the open window.

"Crawl space is clear," a voice called. "Somebody get me the hell out of here."

Evelyn asked, "You heard it, right?"

"Yes." Amanda leaned against the counter. They both stood there, ears straining for the noise. And then they heard it again. Papers rustling. A thumping. It was coming from under the sink.

Evelyn still had her gun. She held it in front of her. Amanda wrapped her hand around the cabinet knob. She silently mouthed the countdown, "One ... two ... three ...," and opened the door.

No one jumped out. No bullets were fired.

Evelyn shook her head. "Nothing."

Amanda looked into the cabinet. It was much like her own. On one side were the usual cleaning supplies: bleach, a few rags, furniture polish. On the other side was a large kitchen trashcan. It was wedged under the sink, almost too big for the space.

Amanda was about to close the door, but the trashcan moved.

"Jesus," Evelyn whispered. Her hand went to her chest. "It's probably a rat." They both looked down the hallway. There were at least thirty men on scene. Evelyn whispered, "I'm terrified of rats."

Amanda wasn't crazy about them, either, but she wasn't about to erase everything they'd done tonight by asking some big strong man to help them.

The trashcan moved again. She heard a noise that sounded like a cough.

"Oh, my God." Evelyn dropped her gun on the counter. She got to her knees and tried to pull out the trashcan. "Help me!"

Amanda grabbed the top of the plastic can. She yanked as hard as she could. The edge came free and she saw two eyes staring up at her.

Almond shaped. Blue. Eyelids as thin as tissue paper.

The baby blinked. His upper lip formed a perfect triangle as he smiled up at Amanda. She felt an ache in her heart, as if he was pulling on an invisible string between them. His tiny hands. The fat little dots of his curled toes.

"Oh, God," Evelyn whispered. She wedged her fingers between the trashcan and cabinet, trying to bend back the plastic. "Oh, God."

Amanda reached down to the baby. She cupped her hand to his face. His cheek was warm. He turned his head, leaning into her palm. His hand brushed against hers. His feet came up. They curved as if he was pressing against an invisible ball. He was so impossibly small. And so perfect. So beautiful.

"I've got it." With one last pull, Evelyn finally freed the trashcan. She picked up the boy, holding him close to her chest. "Little lamb," she murmured, pressing her lips to his head. "Poor little lamb."

From nowhere, Amanda felt a flash of jealousy. Tears sprang into her eyes, blurring her vision. Blinding her.

And then came the rage.

Of all the horrors Amanda had seen in the last week, this was the worst. How had this happened? Who had thrown away this child?

"Amanda?" It was Deena Coolidge. The scarf around her neck was blue. She had a white lab coat on. "Ev? What happened? Are you two okay?"

Amanda's bare feet slapped against the floor as she stalked out of the kitchen. She was running by the time she reached the front door. They were loading Ulster into the ambulance. She bolted into the street and pushed the medic out of her way.

Ulster was strapped down to the gurney. His wrists were handcuffed to the metal stiles. His clothes had been cut open. A bloody bandage was taped to his side, another to his leg. Gauze was wrapped around his arm. His throat was as red as Evelyn's jaw.

The EMT said, "We need to trach him. He's not getting enough air."

"We found him," Amanda told Ulster. "We beat you. I beat you."

Ulster's wet lips curved into a self-satisfied smile. He could barely breathe, but he was still laughing at her.

"Amanda Wagner. Evelyn Mitchell. Deena Coolidge. Cindy Murray. Pam Canale. Holly Scott. You remember those names. You remember the names of the women who brought you down."

Air wheezed from Ulster's mouth, but he was shaking with laughter, not fear.

She had seen the look in his eyes a million times before—from her father, from Butch and Landry, from Bubba Keller. He was amused. He was humoring her.

All right, doll. Run along now.

Amanda stood on the bottom rung of the gurney so she could loom over Ulster the same way he had loomed over her.

“You’re never going to see him.” He blinked as her spit flew into his eye. “He’ll never know you. I swear before God he’ll never know what you did.”

Ulster’s smile would not fade. He took a deep breath, then another. His voice was a strangled gasp. “We’ll see.”

July 23, 1975

ONE WEEK LATER

Amanda smiled as she pulled into the parking lot of the Zone 1 station house. A month ago, she would've laughed if someone suggested that she'd be happy to be back here. A week of crossing guard duty had taught her a hard lesson.

She took one of the far spaces in the back of the lot. The engine knocked when she turned the key. Amanda checked the time. Evelyn was running late. Amanda should go inside the squad and wait for her, but she was thinking of this as their triumphant return. Having to spend five days in the grueling heat dressed in a wool uniform while lazy children tromped in and out of traffic had not negated the fact that they had caught a killer.

Amanda unzipped her purse. She took out the last report she was ever going to type for Butch Bonnie. She hadn't done it out of kindness. She'd done it because she needed to make sure it was right.

Wilbur Trent. Amanda had named the baby because no one else would. Hank Bennett did not want to sully his family's name. Or perhaps he didn't want the legal entanglement of Lucy having an heir. Evelyn had been right about the insurance policies. With Hank Bennett's parents dead and his sister murdered, he was now the sole beneficiary to their estate. He'd let the city bury his sister in a pauper's grave while he walked away from probate court a millionaire.

So, it fell to Amanda to buy Wilbur his first blanket, his first tiny T-shirt. Leaving him at the children's home had been the most difficult thing Amanda had ever done in her life. More difficult than facing down James Ulster. More difficult than finding her mother hanging dead from a tree.

She would keep her promise to Ulster. The child would never know his father. He would never know that his mother was a junkie and a whore.

Amanda had never written fiction before. She was nervous about the details she'd put into Butch's report, the blatant lies she'd told about Lucy Bennett's life before her abduction.

The boy could never know. Something good had to come out of all this misery.

"What's the skinny?" Evelyn stood outside the car. She was dressed in brown slacks and a checkered orange shirt that buttoned up the front. The bruise on her jaw had started to yellow, but it still blackened the bottom half of her face.

Amanda asked, "Why are you dressed like a man?"

"If we're going to be running around the city, I'm not going to ruin another pair of perfectly good pantyhose."

"I don't plan on doing much running anymore." Amanda tucked the report back into her purse. She zipped the bag closed quickly. She didn't want Evelyn to see the application she'd requested from the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. Her father had gotten his old job back. Captain Wilbur Wagner would be running Zone 1 again by the end of the month.

Evelyn frowned sympathetically as Amanda got out of the car. "Did you go by the children's home again this morning?"

Amanda didn't answer. "I need to wash my hands."

Evelyn followed her to the back of the Plaza Theater.

Amanda gave a heavy sigh. "I only said that so you would leave me alone."

Evelyn held open the exit door, releasing the pornographic grunts of Vixen Volleyball. The two men standing in the lobby looked very startled to see them.

"Your wives send their regards," Evelyn told them, heading toward the bathroom.

Amanda shook her head as she followed. "You're going to get us shot one of these days."

Evelyn picked up their earlier conversation. "Sweetie, you can't keep looking in on him every day. Babies need to bond with people. You don't want him getting attached to you."

Amanda turned on the faucet. She looked down at her hands as she washed them. That was exactly what she wanted with Wilbur, but she couldn't quite bring herself to say the words. It was hopeless. She was twenty-five and single. There was no way the state would let her adopt. And they were probably right not to.

Evelyn asked, "Did you get that slide with the skin on it from Pete?"

She patted her face with cold water. She had the sealed evidence envelope in her purse. "I still don't know why it matters."

"Pete's right about the science. They can't use it now, but maybe one day." She added, "You don't want it getting lost in lockup. They'll throw it out in five years."

Amanda turned off the sink. "If we had the death penalty, none of this would matter."

"Amen." Evelyn took her compact out of her purse. "Where are you going to put the envelope?"

"I have no idea." She couldn't very well walk into the bank and ask for a safe deposit box without Duke's signature. "How about your gun safe?"

"It should stay with the baby. Get Edna to hide it somewhere." She smiled. "Make sure she doesn't lock it in the pantry."

Amanda laughed. Edna Flannigan had a reputation around child services, but she was a good woman who cared about the kids. She had taken a shine to Wilbur. Amanda could tell. He was an easy baby to love.

"Can I have one of your textbooks?"

Evelyn stopped powdering her nose. "Why?"

"Edna said we could leave some stuff for the baby to have when he grows up. I thought we could ..."

Evelyn knew about the story of Lucy Bennett, star student. She'd helped craft it, giving some inside details about Georgia Tech so the lies seemed more plausible. "If I give you one of my statistics books, will you promise to stop moping?”

“I’m not moping.”

Evelyn snapped her compact closed. “We need to talk about our next case.”

“What’s that?”

“The DNF. We can look into those murders.”

“Are you forgetting Landry’s the one who got us busted to crossing guards?” Duke had found him out in two phone calls. Landry was drinking buddies with the commander who’d signed off on the transfer. It wasn’t a conspiracy so much as a male chauvinist pig who couldn’t take two women trying to do his job. “That’s all we need to do is put ourselves in his crosshairs again.”

“I’m not afraid of that blowhard.” She fluffed her hair in the mirror. “We saved a life, Amanda.”

“We lost three, maybe four.” God knew where Kitty Treadwell was. Probably buried in the city dump. Not that her father cared. Andrew Treadwell refused to return their phone calls, let alone admit that he had a second daughter. “And neither one of us came out unscathed.”

“But we know people now. We have sources. We have a network. We can work cases just like the boys—even better.”

Amanda could only stare at her. The grunting sounds from the porn movie only added to the ridiculousness of her statement. “Is there anything you can’t put a positive spin on?”

“Hitler. World hunger. Redheads—I just don’t trust them.” Evelyn checked her makeup again. Amanda did the same, frowning at what she saw. Evelyn wasn’t the only one who was bruised. Amanda’s neck was still ringed dark from Ulster’s hands. Her ribs were tender to the touch. The cuts on her palms and the soles of her feet were just starting to scab.

Evelyn caught her eye in the mirror.

War wounds.

They were both smiling as they left the bathroom.

Evelyn asked, “Did I tell you about that Green Beret in North Carolina who murdered his entire family?”

“Yes.” Amanda held up her hand to stop her. “Twice. I would rather talk about the case again than hear the details, thank you very much.”

The lobby was empty. Evelyn stopped. She put her hands on her hips. “You know the insurance policies still bother me.”

Hank Bennett. She couldn’t let it go.

Evelyn pressed, “Bennett went to the mission looking for Lucy. It follows that he’d end up at the soup kitchen and meet James Ulster.”

“Maybe they met, but to say they were working together ...” Amanda shook her head. “Why? What would be the point?”

“Bennett gets his sister out of the picture so she can’t inherit his parents’ money. He keeps Kitty Treadwell for himself—and her money, because you know there has to be some.”

“You think Hank Bennett’s hiding Kitty somewhere.” It wasn’t a question. She’d been beating that dead horse all week. “To what end?”

“To blackmail Andrew Treadwell.” She had a smile on her face. “Mark my word, Hank Bennett’s going to be running that firm one day.”

Amanda sighed. She wondered if Evelyn’s magazines were to blame for these crazy conspiracies. “Kitty Treadwell is buried somewhere in a shallow grave. Ulster took them to kill them, not rehabilitate them.”

“Someone put that baby in the trashcan.”

Amanda didn’t have an answer for her. Part of Lucy’s body was still sewn to the mattress when they found her. Pete Hanson couldn’t give them an exact window for the time between Wilbur’s birth and Lucy’s death. They could only assume the girl had been free at some point and hidden the baby.

And then Ulster had come home and sewn her back down?

Evelyn said, “I just feel like we’re missing something.”

Amanda didn’t want to feed the flame, but she had the same bad feeling. “Who else could’ve helped him?” she asked. “Trey Callahan was caught in Biloxi with his fiancée.” The man claimed that he’d only stolen the money from the mission in order to self-publish his book. “Obviously, Ulster was trying to frame Callahan with all that Ophelia stuff. Don’t you think if there was a second killer, then Ulster would’ve framed that person instead?”

“How about this: where’s the money coming from?”

Herman Centrello. Evelyn was determined to find out how James Ulster was paying for the best criminal defense lawyer in the Southeast.

Amanda shook her head. “Why does it matter? No lawyer in the world can get him out of this. Ulster was caught red-handed. His bloody fingerprints are on the knife.”

“He’ll skate on the other girls. We don’t have anything to tie him to Jane or Mary. We don’t have Kitty’s body—if it’s out there. Ulster could eventually get paroled. That’s why you need to hold on to that slide. Maybe the science will be ready for it by then.”

“He’ll be in his sixties. He’ll be too old to walk, let alone hurt anybody.”

Evelyn pushed open the exit door. “And we’ll be retired little grannies, living with our husbands in Florida, wondering why our children never call.”

Amanda wanted to hold on to that image. She wanted to think about it tonight when she tried to go to sleep and all she could see was that condescending look in Ulster’s eyes. He’d been laughing at her. He was holding something back, and he knew that it gave him power over everyone else.

Evelyn asked, “Did Kenny call you?”

Amanda let her blush be her answer. She adjusted her purse over her shoulder as they walked toward the station. There was a commotion going on by the front door. Two cops were wrangling with a wino. He already had a resisting-arrest turban. His hands waved wildly as he was jerked back by his collar.

Amanda said, “We actually wanted to come back to this.”

Evelyn looked at her watch. “Crap, we’re late for roll call.”

So much for their triumphant return. Luther Hodge would probably put them on desk duty all week. Amanda hated filing, but at least she’d have Evelyn to commiserate with. Maybe they could look at some of the cases on the missing black girls. There was no harm in putting together another construction paper puzzle.

“Hey!” The wino was still struggling as they walked to the entrance of the station. One of the patrolmen smacked him on the ear. The man’s head jerked like a sling.

The squad was as smoke-filled and dingy as usual. The room looked the same:

crooked rows of tables crossing the room, white on one side, black on the other. Men in front, women in back. Hodge was at the podium. Everyone was seated for roll call.

But for some reason, they started to stand.

First, it was some of the white detectives, then slowly the blacks stood from their tables. It went around the room in a slow wave, ending with Vanessa Livingston, who, as usual, was sitting in the last row. She gave them both a thumbs-up. Her teeth showed in a proud grin.

Evelyn seemed momentarily stunned, but she kept her head high as she walked into the room. Amanda tried to do the same as she followed. The men cleared a path for them. No one spoke. They didn't whistle. They didn't make catcalls. Some of them nodded. Rick Landry was the only one who remained seated, but standing beside him was Butch Bonnie, who seemed to have some grudging respect in his eyes.

Then the moment was ruined as the wino was thrown into the squad room. He jumped up from the floor, screaming, "I'll sue you motherfuckers!"

The room tensed. The drunk's eyes widened as he realized he was facing down a room full of cops. He nervously glanced at Amanda, then Evelyn. "Uh ... s'cuse the language, ladies."

"Shee-it." Butch took the toothpick out of his mouth. "They ain't no ladies, fella. They're the po-lice."

The room heaved a collective sigh. Jokes were passed around. The drunk was wrangled out the door. Hodge banged the podium for silence.

Amanda fought the smile on her lips as she walked to the back of the room. She could feel Evelyn behind her, knew she was thinking the same thing.

Finally—acceptance.

Present Day

WEDNESDAY

Will sat on the wooden bench at the top of the rolling hill. He rested his elbows on his knees. He looked down at the street as the police cruiser pulled out of the driveway. His father a murderer. His uncle a murderer. Will had it on both sides.

Footsteps crunched across the gravel driveway. Amanda put her hand on his shoulder, but only to help herself sit.

They both stared into the empty street. Seconds turned into minutes. Will could hear a white noise in his ears. A humming that made it impossible for his brain to hold on to any one thought.

Amanda gave a heavy sigh. "Evelyn's never going to let me live this down. She always thought there was someone else."

"Is she going to testify against him?"

"Kitty?" Amanda shrugged with her good shoulder. "I doubt it. If she was going to talk, she would've done so years ago. I have a feeling she's still too much under Henry's control." She gave a rueful laugh. "You've come a long way, baby."

Will couldn't pretend he was all right with all this. He couldn't brush off tragedy with a wry comment the way Amanda did. "Tell me what happened. The truth."

Amanda stared at the front lawn, the vast green space that was larger and better tended than most public parks. She obviously needed time to collect her thoughts. Honesty wasn't a natural act for Amanda Wagner. Will could tell it took effort.

Finally, she said, "You know that there were two victims. Your mother and Jane Delray."

"Right." Will had found the reference in his father's file. There wasn't enough evidence to tie James Ulster to the murder of Jane Delray, but it was assumed that he was guilty of the act. "It was his pattern. He takes two and decides which one to keep."

"There were two other girls. Mary Halston and Kitty Treadwell."

Will gripped together his hands.

She said, "Your mother and Mary Halston showed the same damage. The sewing. The needle marks. But Jane was different. She wasn't abducted. Her murder was spur-of-the-moment. She was strangled, then thrown from the roof so that her death would look like a suicide."

"Henry?"

"I wasn't sure until I saw that check. What I said was the absolute truth. It bothered Evelyn that Ulster had a high-priced lawyer. Frankly, it bothered me. Ulster was never interested in material things. He wanted control, and I guess making Hank mail him that check at the jail exerted some control."

"Henry's going to skate on the envelope. You know the check isn't enough."

"Henry's DNA is going to match evidence from Jane Delray's case. I called the gal who's in charge of archival evidence the minute I heard your father was out. It's a miracle the chain of custody was still intact, or we'd never be able to use it."

"What's the evidence?"

"It's what I said in there. Jane scratched her attacker. It's going to match Henry's DNA from the envelope."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Aren't you?"

Will had seen his uncle's face. He was sure.

"What about Kitty?"

"I can only give an educated guess. Ulster got her off heroin. Hank kept her to leverage money out of Treadwell." She nodded back toward the house. "Not a bad plan, as you can see."

Will looked at the house. Mansion wasn't even the right word for it. Museum, maybe. Prison.

Amanda asked, "Is there anything else you want to know?"

There was a lifetime of questions. "Why are you making me pull teeth?"

"Because this is difficult for me, too, Will."

He hadn't considered that. For all her bluster, Will knew that Amanda was close to this. Her first case. Her first homicide. She tried to act like it was nothing, but the fact that they were both sitting here right now belied that assertion.

Eventually, she said, "Hank always hated women. I imagine he hated Lucy for her independence. Her free spirit. That she made choices for herself. She was going to school. Living in Atlanta. Hank thought women should stay in their place. Most men did back then. Not all of them, but—" She shrugged her shoulder again. "All you need to know is that your mother was a good person. She was smart and independent, and she loved you."

A cable truck drove down the street. Will could hear the hum of the wheels on the road. He wondered what it felt like to live in a mansion, to watch the rest of the world pass you by.

Amanda said, "Everyone I interviewed at the school loved her."

Will shook his head. He'd heard enough.

"She was funny and kind. She was very popular. All of her professors were devastated when they heard what happened. She had great promise."

He tried to swallow the glass in his throat.

"I was there when she died." Amanda paused again. "Her last words were for you, Will. She said that she loved you. She wouldn't let go until she was certain we heard her, until she knew that we understood that with every breath in her body, she loved you."

Will pressed his fingers into his eyes. He wasn't going to cry in front of her. There would be no going back from that.

"She hid you in the trashcan to save you from your father." Amanda paused. "Evelyn was there. We found you together. I don't think I've ever been so angry in my life. Not before or since."

Will swallowed again. He had to clear his throat to speak. "Edna Flannigan. You knew her."

"A lot of my cases took me to the children's home." Amanda adjusted the strap on her sling. "No one told me she'd passed away. When I found out—" She looked Will straight in the eye. "Trust me, her replacement was duly punished for his actions."

Will couldn't help but take some pleasure in the thought of Amanda annihilating the man who'd kicked him out into the street. "What was in the basement? What were you looking for?"

She stared back at the lawn, letting out a long sigh. "I wonder if we'll ever know."

Will remembered the scratches in the coal chute. He'd assumed they had been made by an animal, but now he knew it was probably one of Amanda's old broods. "Someone went back there while we were at the hospital."

"Really?" Amanda pretended to be surprised.

Will tried to let her know he wasn't a complete idiot. There was no way a slide had been in police custody for thirty-seven years. "Archival evidence."

"Archival evidence?" She had an infuriating smile on her lips, and he knew she was back in full dissembling mode before she even opened her mouth. "Never heard of it."

"Cindy Murray," he continued. Will's caseworker, the woman who'd helped him get off the streets and into college.

"Murray?" Amanda drew out the name, finally shaking her head. "Doesn't ring a bell."

"Captain Scott at the jail—"

She chuckled. "Remind me to tell you stories about the old jail sometime. It was awful before Holly cleaned it up."

"Rachel Foster." Amanda still called on the federal judge to sign off on her warrants. "I know you're friends with her."

"Rachel and I came up together. She worked dispatch, the night shift, so she could go to law school during the day."

"She expunged my record when I graduated from college."

Amanda would only say, "Rachel's a good gal."

Will couldn't help himself. He had to find at least one crack. "I've never known you to go on another GBI recruiting trip. Not once in fifteen years. Just the one where you got me to sign up."

"Well." She adjusted the sling again. "No one really enjoys those trips. You talk to fifty people and half of them are illiterate." She smiled at him. "Not that that's a bad thing."

"Did I get it from him?" He couldn't look at her. Amanda knew about his dyslexia. "My problem?"

"No." She spoke with certainty. "You saw his Bible. He was constantly reading."

"That girl—Suzanna Ford. She saw—"

"She saw a tall man. That's all. You're nothing like him, Will. I knew James Ulster. I talked to him. I looked him in the eye. There's not a drop of your father inside of you. It's all Lucy. Everything about you comes straight from your mother. You have to believe me on that, at least. I wouldn't waste my time on you otherwise."

Will clasped his hands in front of him. The grass was lush beneath his feet. His mother would be fifty-six years old now. Maybe she would've been an academic. Her textbooks were well read. Words were underlined. Asterisks were scribbled in the margins. She might have been an engineer or mathematician or a feminist scholar.

He had spent so many hours with Angie talking about the what-ifs. What if Lucy had lived? What if Angie's mom hadn't taken that overdose? What if they hadn't grown up in the home? What if they'd never met each other?

But his mother had died. So had Angie's, though it'd taken longer. They'd both grown up in the home. They'd been connected to each other for nearly three decades. Their anger was like a magnet between them. Sometimes it pulled them together. Most times it pushed them apart.

Will had seen what it took to hold on to resentment that long. He read it in Kitty Treadwell's emaciated body. He saw it in the arrogant tilt of his uncle Henry's chin. And sometimes, when she didn't think anyone was looking, he saw it flash in Amanda's eyes.

Will couldn't live like that. He couldn't let the first eighteen years of his life ruin the next sixty.

He reached into his pocket. The metal of the wedding ring was cold against his fingers. He held it out to Amanda. "I want you to take this."

"Well." She pretended to be embarrassed as she took the ring. "This is rather sudden. Our age difference is—"

Will tried to take it back, but she wrapped her hand around his.

Amanda Wagner was not an affectionate woman. She rarely touched him in kindness. She punched his arm. She smacked his shoulder. She'd even once pulled back the safety plate on a nail gun and feigned surprise when the nail shot through the webbing between his thumb and index finger.

But now, she held on to his hand. Her fingers were small, her wrist impossibly tiny. There was clear polish on her fingernails. Age spots dotted the back of her hand. Her shoulder leaned into his. Will gently returned the pressure. Her grip tightened for just a second before she let go.

She said, "You're a good boy, Wilbur."

Will didn't trust himself to respond without his voice cracking. Normally, he would've made a joke about crying like a girl, but the phrase was a contradiction to the woman sitting beside him.

Amanda said, "We should go before Kitty turns the hose on us." She dropped the ring into her purse as she stood from the bench. Instead of hefting the bag onto her shoulder, she gripped it in one hand.

Will offered, "Do you want me to carry that?"

"For God's sakes, I'm not an invalid." She pulled the bag onto her shoulder, as if to prove a point. "Button your collar. You weren't raised in a barn. And don't think we've had our last conversation on the subject of your hair."

Will buttoned his collar as he walked with her to her car.

Kitty Treadwell stood at the open front door, watching them carefully. A cigarette hung from her lips. Smoke curled up into her eye.

She said, "I paid the property taxes."

Amanda was reaching for the car door. She stopped.

"On the Techwood house." Kitty walked down the stairs. She stopped a few feet from the car. "I paid the taxes. Worth every penny. It chapped Henry's ass when James sold it."

"Mine, too," Amanda admitted. "Four million dollars is quite a profit."

"Money's the only thing Henry understands." Kitty took the cigarette out of her mouth. "I thought it would go to Wilbur."

"He doesn't want it," Amanda said.

"No." Kitty smiled at Will. It gave him a cold feeling inside. "You turned out better than all of us. How on earth did that happen?"

Will couldn't answer her. He couldn't even bear to look at her.

Amanda asked, "Hank met Ulster at the soup kitchen?"

Kitty reluctantly turned back to Amanda. "He was looking for Lucy. He wanted to make sure she wouldn't lay claim to their parents' estate. It must've seemed like a match made in heaven." She held the cigarette to her lips. "They struck a grand bargain. Hank gave him Lucy, no strings attached. In return, Ulster got me off the dope. Though I don't recommend his methods." She smiled as if this was all a joke. "I suppose James thought Lucy was a good trade. A fallen angel with no parents or family to make a stink." She huffed out some smoke. "And besides, Mary wasn't really doing it for him anymore."

"Why did he kill her?"

"Mary?" Kitty shrugged. "She couldn't be broken. Something about being pregnant changes you. At least it seems that way from the outside. Commendable, but look where it got her."

"And Jane Delray?"

"Oh, they fought constantly about Jane. Henry wanted her out of the way. She wouldn't shut up. She kept telling anyone who would listen about Lucy, about Mary, about me. I suppose I was lucky I didn't meet the same end. I was constantly throwing around my father's name." She stuttered a laugh. "As if anyone in the ghetto gave a rat's ass who my father was."

"They fought about it?" Amanda echoed.

"James didn't care who that little slut talked to. He got quite high and mighty about it, unsurprisingly. He was doing the Lord's work, after all. He wasn't a hired killer. God was going to protect him."

Amanda made the obvious connection. "You were kept in the house with Lucy."

"Yes. I was there the whole time." She seemed to be waiting for Amanda to ask another question. "The entire time."

Amanda said nothing.

"Anyway." Kitty tapped some ash onto the driveway. "I reconciled with my father at the end." She huffed a bitter laugh. "More money for Henry's coffers. What's the saying? God doesn't close a door without first nailing shut all the windows?"

Amanda offered, "If you testify, I can—"

"You can't really do anything. We both know that."

"You can leave him. You can leave him right now."

“Why would I do that?” She seemed genuinely perplexed. “He’s my husband. I love him.”

Her matter-of-fact tone was as shocking as anything Will had heard today. She really seemed to want an answer.

Amanda asked, “How could you? After all he did?”

Kitty snarled out a long stream of smoke. “You know how it is with men.” She flicked the cigarette into the yard. “Sometimes it’s criminal what a woman has to do.”

Present Day

ONE WEEK LATER

Sara's greyhounds had been spoiled rotten. Will had started giving them cheese, which Sara had discovered the hard way. Apparently, it was an ongoing thing. The dogs were obsessed. The minute they recognized Will's street, they started pulling on their leashes like huskies running the Klondike. By the time she got to his driveway, Sara's arms felt as if they'd been ripped out of the sockets.

She gripped the leashes in one hand as she dug around in her pocket for the key to Will's house. Thankfully, his Porsche pulled up behind her. He waved as he pulled past. The dogs pounced.

"Look at you," Will cooed. He rubbed the dogs up and down. "Aren't you good boys?"

"They're nasty," Sara said. "No more cheese."

Will was laughing when he stood up. "Dogs need cheese. They can't find it in the wild."

Sara opened her mouth to counter his argument, but he kissed her so long and so well that she didn't care anymore.

Will smiled down at her. "Did you hear back from your cousin?"

"We can have his beach house the whole week."

His smile turned into a grin. He took the leashes. The dogs were considerably better behaved as they led Will up the walkway. Sara couldn't help but think how much better Will looked. He was back at his real job. He was sleeping through the night. He wasn't so shell-shocked anymore.

Will waited until Sara had closed the front door to let the dogs off their leashes. They bolted to the kitchen, but Will didn't follow them. He told Sara, "Henry's arraignment is next week."

"We can postpone the beach if—"

"No."

She watched him empty his pockets, putting his keys and money on the desk. "How's the case going?"

"Henry's fighting it, but you can't argue with DNA." He slid his paddle holster off his belt. "What about you? How was your day?"

"I need to tell you something."

He looked wary. Sara couldn't blame him. He'd had enough bad news lately.

"Your father's tox screen came back."

Will straightened the pen on his desk. "What did they find?"

"He had Demerol in his bloodstream. Not a lot."

He gave her a careful look. "Pills?"

"Medical grade, injectable."

He asked, "How much is not a lot?"

"He was a big guy, so it's hard to be sure. I'd guess enough to make him relax but not knock him out completely." She said, "They found the vial in the refrigerator under the bar. There was a syringe in the disposal box with residue. His fingerprints were on both."

Will rubbed the side of his face with his fingers. "He never used drugs before. That was his thing. He was against them."

"You know how bad prisons are. A lot of people change their minds about drugs when they get inside."

"Where would he get liquid Demerol?"

Sara cast about for an explanation. "The prostitute who visited him the night before could've brought it. Did the police ever find her?"

"No," Will answered. "They never found the nail polish, either."

Sara knew Will hated loose ends. "Maybe she stole it. Most of those girls are addicts. They're not having sex with twenty to thirty men a day because it's fun."

"What was the cause of death?" He seemed wary of saying the word. "Overdose?"

"His heart wasn't in great shape. You know these things aren't always conclusive. The medical examiner listed natural causes, but he could've had other drugs on board—inhaled something, swallowed something, had a bad reaction. It's impossible to test for everything."

"Did Pete handle the case?"

"No, he's taken medical leave. It was one of his assistants. He's a smart guy. I trust him."

Will kept working his jaw. "Did he suffer?"

"I don't know," she admitted. "I wish I could tell you."

Betty barked. She pranced around Will's feet. "I'd better feed them."

He headed toward the kitchen. Sara followed him. Instead of picking up the bowls and getting out the cans from the cabinet, Will stood in the middle of the room.

There was a padded envelope on his kitchen table. A bright red lipstick print kissed the center. Sara instantly recognized Angie Trent's handiwork. She'd found a note with the same lipstick kiss on her car every morning this week. She doubted very seriously that Angie had written "Whore" inside, but she asked Will anyway, "What does she want?"

"I have no idea." Will sounded angry, then defensive, as if he could control his wife. "I changed the locks. I don't know how she got in."

Sara didn't bother to respond. Angie was an ex-cop. She knew how to pick a lock. Working vice, she'd learned how to skate back and forth across the lines with impunity.

Will said, "I'll throw it away."

Sara tried to quell her irritation. "It's all right."

"No, it's not." Will picked up the envelope. It wasn't sealed. The flap opened.

Sara jumped back, though what clattered onto the table was hardly dangerous. At least not anymore.

The prostitute at the Four Seasons had been the last person to see Will's father alive. She knew the regular girls. She knew how they dressed, where they picked up their johns. More important, she knew that adjusting her hat in full view of the elevator security camera would draw attention to her recently manicured fingernails.

And that still wasn't enough.

Like a cat leaving a dead animal on its owner's doorstep, Angie Trent had taken a souvenir from the crime scene so that Will would know exactly what she'd done for him.

Glass bottle. Pointy white cap.

Bombshell red.

It was the missing bottle of Max Factor nail polish.

to Vernon—for directing my sails

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Ben Hecht said, “Trying to determine what is going on in the world by reading newspapers is like trying to tell time by watching the second hand of a clock.” With that in mind, I perused many 1970s editions of both the Atlanta Journal and Atlanta Constitution, whose archives offered a fascinating glimpse into the daily lives of Atlantans. The Atlanta Daily World offered a sometimes countervailing and often more in-depth take on the same events. Atlanta magazine provided a great source for historical context, including their “best of” issues as well as a shockingly hilarious profile of the swingin’ Riverbend apartment complex. Back issues of Cosmopolitan magazine gave tips on hairstyles, celebrities, and achieving sexual satisfaction—so different from what they focus on today. Newsweek, Time, Ladies’ Home Journal, and the Sears catalogue were also great guides for apparel and decorating. AtlantaTimeMachine.com showcases myriad before and after photos of city hotspots. There are an alarming number of 1970s TV commercials on YouTube that sucked away hours of my life that I will never get back. My only consolation is that the posters spent more time uploading them than I did watching them.

I enlisted Daniel Starer at Research for Writers to help pull material I needed for this story. I thought this was a brilliant cheat on my part until the volumes of research arrived on my doorstep and I realized that I would then have to read everything. (A full list can be found on my website.) Dan also located a man named Robert Barnes, who filmed a documentary on the Atlanta Police Force in 1975. Robert, an Atlanta native, was kind enough to send me a copy of the film, which shows much of the Atlanta skyline and features lots of helicopter shots of Techwood Homes and downtown. He also shared his memories of growing up in Atlanta, for which I am very grateful.

I spent many hours either online or in person at the Atlanta History Center, the Auburn Avenue Research Library, the Georgia Tech Library, the Georgia State University Pullman Library, and the Library of Congress. (Hey, didja notice all these places have “library” in their names? Maybe we really do need libraries after all.)

To say I hit paydirt at the Atlanta History Center is an understatement. It was there that I first found mention of Patricia W. Remington’s Policing: The Occupation and the Introduction of Female Police Officers (University Press of America, 1981). This dissertation is based on Remington’s year-long field study of the Atlanta Police Force in 1975. She rode along on beats. She often watched interrogations. They even trusted her with a revolver. From Ms. Remington’s work, I was able to cull staff rotations, statistical data, organizational structure, and socioeconomic details of the Atlanta force. As the focus of the study was on women officers, there were several transcripts of interviews performed with both male and female police officers regarding women on the force. Many of the ten-codes, slang (“hummy,” “trim,” and “crack”), and often horrendous practical jokes officers played came from Remington’s observations.

Though I used the dissertation as a starting point, I also spoke with several women police officers who came up in the 1970s. Marla Lawson at the GBI is as entertaining a storyteller as I’ve ever heard. I would also like to thank law enforcement officers Dona Robertson, Barbara Lynch, and Vickye Prattes for driving all the way into Atlanta to talk with me. SL, EC, and BB gave me insider knowledge on how things still work (or don’t) in various Georgia forces. And, though men don’t exactly get the star treatment in this book, I would like to thank, as always, Director Vernon Keenan and John Bankhead at the GBI. Actually, I would like to thank all the officers out there who take care of the rest of us. Y’all are doing the Lord’s work.

I feel I should mention Reginald Eaves, who features prominently in this story. Eaves has long been a controversial figure in Atlanta politics. A 1978 test-rigging scandal forced him out of the police force. In 1980, he was elected to the Fulton County Commission. By 1984, he was under investigation for extortion and eventually imprisoned in 1988. And, yet ... there’s no denying that under Commissioner Eaves, Atlanta saw its crime rate drop significantly. He increased recruit training, instigated a formal path to promotion, and made all officers take “crisis intervention” classes to learn how to better deal with domestic cases. He focused most of his resources on black-on-black crime, saying, “No matter how poor you are, there is no excuse for knocking a lady in the head or stealing her purse.” To me, this makes Eaves a quintessential Atlanta politician.

Though some still think of the 1970s as a decade of love and freedom, women of that time were generally still facing an uphill battle. Opening a checking account, getting a car loan or mortgage—even signing a lease—were out of reach for many American women unless their fathers or husbands co-signed. (Don’t get ahead of yourself, New York City. It wasn’t until 1974 that gender discrimination in housing was legally barred.) In 1972, it finally became legal for unmarried women to use the Pill, though some still had a difficult time finding a doctor who would write the prescription and a pharmacist to fill it. The Sex Discrimination Act of 1975, meant to put a finer point on the Equal Pay Act of 1963, highlighted the fact that women were earning only 62 percent of men’s salaries. The APD, as all police forces, had to follow the law, so policing was one of the few jobs for women that gave them both economic and social power.

That was the extent of the progressive side of policing. Most men—and many women—felt that women should not be police officers. The stories about people laughing when a female officer came on scene are true. Women were routinely set up to fail, and punished when they did not. There were many areas of law enforcement where women were strictly verboten. This is not to say that men were entirely the problem. A 1974 article in the Atlanta Constitution talks about phone calls coming into the station—all from women—saying they’d seen a woman stealing a police car. They could not fathom that the “thief” was actually a female police officer who was driving the car on her beat. (Another quote, this one from H. L. Mencken: “Misogynist: a man who hates women as much as women hate one another.”)

Thank you, Valerie Jackson, for giving me a glimpse into Mayor Maynard Jackson's thinking during his first term. The statements he made on behalf of women and minorities are commonplace among politicians these days, though seldom followed through in the way Mayor Jackson managed. I think I speak for many Atlantans when I say that his legacy lives on in so many positive ways.

Vernon Jordan was extremely helpful in giving context to the story. I thank you, sir, for your insightful suggestion, which gave me the key to unlocking the narrative. You kept saying you couldn't tell me much, but you pretty much told me everything. I'm certain I'm not the only person on whom you've had this effect.

Linda Fairstein is not just one of my favorite authors, but a woman who served on the front lines of New York City's first sex crimes unit. Her groundbreaking work was made possible by the same LEAA grants that benefited many women in policing. Linda, I applaud your efforts to pay it forward for women all over the country.

Special thanks goes to Jeanene English for showing me how hair weaves work. Kate White, you constantly remind me of the great things women can accomplish when we support each other. I would especially like to thank Monica Pearson (nee Kaufman) for one of the more pleasant afternoons of my life. Emily Saliers, thank you for telling me about your Atlanta. Though I've never had the honor of meeting Tyne Daily or Sharon Gless, any woman my age knows this story holds a special debt of gratitude to both.

As usual, Dr. David Harper helped make Sara and Pete look like they know what they are doing. I feel I should say something about Grady Hospital, the largest public hospital in the country. This H-shaped behemoth is a testament to the best and worst of us. The ER Sara works in is nothing like the real Grady ER, mostly because it would take thousands of pages to do justice to the wash of humanity packed into the halls on a daily basis. My hat is off to the Grady doctors and nurses for running toward the problems instead of away from them.

Henrik Enemark, my Danish translator, sent me some groovy photos of his high school trip to Atlanta. Ineke Lenting, my Dutch translator, was also a tremendous help. Marty, curator of the Pram Museum, answered a strange question quickly and unblinkingly. Kitty Stockett lent her name to a prostitute (maybe this will finally get her work the attention it deserves). Pam Canale was the big winner of the "Have Your Name Appear in Karin Slaughter's Next Book" auction to benefit the Dekalb County Public Library system. Diane Palmer put a wicked idea into my head. Debbie T., thank you for your continuing help with capturing Will's world. Beth Tindall at Cincinnati Media has long been my webmaster and BFF. Victoria Sanders, Angela Cheng Caplan, and Diane Golden are the best team a gal could ask for. Thanks, too, to Kate Elton, my good friend and longtime editor, for making my job so easy. Jennifer Hershey, Libby McGuire, Cindy Murray, Gina Centrello, and Susan Corcoran—thanks for bringing home the bacon and frying it up in the pan.

My father regaled me one night with tales from the underbelly of 1970s Atlanta. He put me onto Mills Lane and the kidnapping case (as well as Mike Thevis, who will certainly show up in other stories, though I am hesitant to ask my father about his connection to the man who changed the face of American porn). I am grateful to my sister, Jatha Slaughter, for talking to me so openly about her life. And to D.A.—as always, you are my heart.

History is a dangerous thing, especially in the hands of a novice. In researching this novel, I came to understand that no one sees the past in the same way. For Atlanta, there is the white perspective, there is the black perspective, and then, there are the (at times, polar opposite) perspectives of the men and women within these categories. Extrapolate this to the melting pot of our current population and you can begin to understand why, as a writer, I chose to settle on one point of view.

That being said, I'm a novelist, not a historian. I don't claim to be an expert on Atlanta in the 1970s—or present day, for that matter. I have certainly taken liberties with some details. (There were no five-story buildings at Techwood Homes. Monica Kaufman, like Spike, Snoopy's brother, did not show up in Atlanta until August of 1975. You will probably get arrested if you hang out in front of the Four Seasons too long looking for that marble fountain.) My main focus in writing this book was to tell a good story. I understood from the beginning that there were several traps inherent in being a southern woman writing about race and gender issues. Please know I worked very hard to make sure everyone—no matter race, religion, creed, gender, or national origin—was equally maligned.

Karin Slaughter

Atlanta, Georgia

www.karinslaughter.com

NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR

KARIN
SLAUGHTER

UNSEEN

A NOVEL

The image shows the front cover of the novel 'Unseen' by Karin Slaughter. The cover is divided into two main vertical sections. The left section is a light gray background with a pattern of soft, out-of-focus water droplets. The right section is a darker gray background with a pattern of sharp, in-focus water droplets. The author's name 'KARIN SLAUGHTER' is printed in a white, serif font at the top of the right section. The title 'UNSEEN' is printed in a large, bold, white, sans-serif font in the center of the right section. Below the title, the words 'A NOVEL' are printed in a smaller, white, sans-serif font. At the bottom of the left section, there is a small black square logo followed by the text 'DELACORTE PRESS' and 'NEW YORK' in a small, black, sans-serif font.

KARIN
SLAUGHTER

UNSEEN

A NOVEL

DELACORTE PRESS
NEW YORK

Unseen is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Copyright © 2013 by Karin Slaughter Publishing, LLC
Excerpt from Cop Town copyright © 2014 by Karin Slaughter Publishing, LLC
Busted copyright © 2014 by Karin Slaughter Publishing, LLC

All rights reserved.

Published in the United States by Delacorte Press, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House, Inc., New York.

DELACORTE PRESS and colophon are registered trademarks of Random House, Inc.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

Slaughter, Karin
Unseen : a novel / Karin Slaughter.
p. cm.

This book contains an excerpt from the forthcoming title Cop Town by Karin Slaughter. This excerpt has been set for this edition only and may not reflect the final content of the forthcoming edition.

eBook ISBN: 978-0-345-53948-9

1. Government investigators—Fiction. 2. Undercover operations—Fiction. I. Title.

PS3569.L275U57 2013
813'.54—dc23 2013005812

www.bantamdell.com

Cover design: Carlos Beltrán

v3.1_r2

Contents

Master - Table of Contents

Unseen

Title Page

Copyright

Chapter 1: Wednesday: Macon, Georgia

Chapter 2: Thursday: Atlanta, Georgia

Chapter 3

Chapter 4: Macon, Georgia: Seven Days Ago—The Day of the Raid

Chapter 5

Chapter 6

Chapter 7: The Day Before the Raid

Chapter 8: Thursday

Chapter 9

Chapter 10: Friday

Chapter 11: Four Days Before the Raid

Chapter 12: Friday

Chapter 13

Chapter 14

Chapter 15: Five Days Before the Raid

Chapter 16: Friday

Chapter 17: Macon, Georgia: Five Days Later

Dedication

Acknowledgments

Other Books by This Author

About the Author

1.

WEDNESDAY

MACON, GEORGIA

Detective Lena Adams winced as she pulled off her T-shirt. She took her police badge out of her pocket, along with her flashlight and an extra clip for her Glock, and tossed them all onto the dresser. The time on her phone showed it was almost midnight. Lena had rolled out of bed eighteen hours ago and now all she wanted to do was fall back in. Not that she'd done that much lately. For the past four days, just about every waking hour had been wasted sitting at a conference room table answering questions she'd answered the day before and the day before that—navigating the usual bullshit that came from having to justify your actions to Internal Affairs.

“Who led the raid into the house?”

“What intelligence were you acting on?”

“What did you expect to find?”

The internal investigator for the Macon Police Department had the dour, lifeless personality of a career pencil pusher. Every day, the woman showed up dressed in the same style black skirt and white blouse, an outfit that seemed more appropriate for greeting diners at an Olive Garden. She nodded a lot, frowned even more as she took notes. When Lena didn't answer quickly, she'd check the tape recorder to make sure it was picking up the silences.

Lena was certain the questions were designed to provoke an outburst. The first day, she had been so numb that she'd just answered truthfully in the hope that it would soon be over. The second and third days, she'd been less forthcoming, her level of irritation rising with each passing minute. Today, she had finally exploded, which seemed exactly what the woman had been waiting for.

“What do you think I expected to find, you miserable bitch?”

If only Lena hadn't found it. If only she could take a razor and slice the images out of her brain. They haunted her. They flickered into her vision like an old movie every time she blinked. They filled her with a constant, unrelenting sorrow.

Lena started to rub her eyes, then thought better of it. Six days had passed since she'd led her team on the raid, but her body was still a walking reminder of what had happened. The bruise fingering its way across her nose and underneath her left eye had turned a urine-yellow. The three stitches holding together the cut in her scalp itched like a rash.

Then there were the things that no one could see—Lena's bruised tailbone. Her aching back and knees. The roil in her stomach every time she thought about what she'd discovered in that desolate house in the woods.

Four dead bodies. One man still in the hospital. Another who would never wear the badge again. Not to mention the terrible memory she would probably end up taking to her grave.

Tears came into Lena's eyes. She bit her lip, fighting the urge to let the grief have its way. She was exhausted. The week had been hard. Hell, the last three weeks had been hard. But it was over now. All of it was over. Lena was safe. She would keep her job. The rat squad investigator had scurried back to her hole. Lena was finally home where no one could stare at her, question her, probe and prod her. It wasn't just Internal Affairs. Everyone wanted to know what the raid had been like, what Lena had found in that dark, dank basement.

And Lena wanted nothing more than to forget all about it.

Her cell phone chirped. Lena exhaled until her lungs were completely empty. The phone chirped a second time. She picked it up. There was a new text message.

VICKERY: u ok?

Lena stared at the letters on the screen. Paul Vickery, her partner.

She tapped reply. Her thumb hovered over the keyboard.

The distant rumble of a motorcycle shook the air.

Instead of typing out a response, Lena held down the power button until the phone turned off. She placed it on the dresser beside her badge.

The roar of the Harley-D's twin-cam engine vibrated in her ears as Jared gunned the bike so he could make it to the top of their steep driveway. Lena waited, following the familiar sounds: the engine cutting, the metallic groan of the kickstand, the heavy tread of boots as her husband made his way into the house, tossed his helmet and keys onto the kitchen table even though she'd asked him a million times not to. He paused for a moment, probably to check the mail, then continued toward their bedroom.

Lena kept her back to the door as she counted off Jared's footsteps down the long hallway. His stride sounded tentative, reluctant. He'd probably been hoping Lena would be asleep.

Jared stopped at the doorway. He was obviously waiting for Lena to turn around. When she didn't, he asked, "You just get in?"

"I stayed late to finish." It wasn't a complete lie. She'd hoped Jared would be asleep, too. "I was about to take a shower."

"All right."

Lena didn't go into the bathroom. Instead, she turned to face him.

Jared's gaze flickered down to her bra, then quickly back up again. He was dressed in his uniform, his hair twisted into a peak from the helmet. He was a cop with the Macon PD, too—a motorman, one rank below Lena and twelve years younger. Neither one of these things used to bother her, but lately, every inch of their lives was a provocation.

He leaned against the doorjamb, asking, "How'd it go?"

"They cleared me to go back to work."

"That's good, right?"

She replayed his words in her head, trying to decipher the tone. "Why wouldn't it be?"

Jared didn't respond. There was a long, uncomfortable silence before he asked, "You want a drink?"

Lena couldn't hide her surprise.

"I guess it's okay now, right?" He tilted his head to the side, forced his lips into a tight smile. He was a few inches taller than Lena, but his muscular frame and athletic grace made him seem larger.

Usually.

Jared cleared his throat to let her know that he was waiting.

She nodded. “ ’Kay.”

Jared left the room, but his need lingered—surrounding her, almost suffocating her. He needed for Lena to break down. He needed for her to lean on him. He needed her to show him that what happened had affected her, had altered her in some tangible way.

He couldn't see that not giving in was the only thing that kept her from falling completely apart.

Lena took her pajamas out of the dresser. She heard Jared moving around the kitchen. He opened the freezer door, rummaged around for a handful of ice. Lena closed her eyes. Her body swayed. She waited for the cubes to hit glass. Her mouth watered in anticipation.

She clenched her jaw. Forced open her eyes.

She wanted the drink too badly. When Jared came back, she would put the glass down, wait a few minutes, prove to herself that she could do without it.

Prove to him that she didn't need it.

Her hands ached as she unbuttoned her jeans. The day of the raid, she'd gripped her shotgun so hard that her fingers had felt like they were permanently curled. She wasn't sure why everything still ached. She should be better now, but her body was holding on to the hurt. Holding on to the poison that was eating her up inside.

“So.” Jared was back. This time, he came into the room. He poured a large vodka as he walked toward her, the bottle gurgling as the liquid splashed into the glass. “You're back on duty tomorrow?”

“First thing.”

He handed her the glass. “No time off?”

Lena took the drink and downed half of it in one gulp.

“I guess that's the same as when ...” Jared's voice trailed off. He didn't have to say when. Instead, he looked out the back window. The dark panes showed his reflection. “I bet you get your sergeant's stripes off this.”

She shook her head, but said, “Maybe.”

He stared at her—waiting. Needing.

She asked, “What are they saying at the station?”

Jared walked to the closet. "That you've got balls of steel." He dialed the combination on the gun safe. Lena watched the back of his neck. There was a pink line of sunburn where his helmet didn't protect the skin. He must've known she was watching, but he just took his holster off his belt and stored his gun beside hers. Near hers. He didn't even let their guns touch.

She asked, "Does it bother you?"

He shut the safe door, spun the combination. "Why would it bother me?"

Lena didn't say the words, but they were screaming in her head: Because they think I'm tougher than you. Because your wife was taking down some very bad guys while you were toodling around on your bike giving tickets to soccer moms.

Jared said, "I'm proud of you." He used his reasonable voice, the one that made Lena want to punch him in the face. "They should give you a medal for what you did."

He had no idea what she'd done. Jared only knew the highlights, the details Lena was allowed to share outside closed doors.

She repeated the question. "Does it bother you?"

He paused for a second too long. "It bothers me that you could've been killed."

He still hadn't answered the question. Lena studied his face. The skin was unlined, fresh. She'd met Jared when he was twenty-one, and in the five and a half years since, he'd somehow started looking younger, like he was aging in reverse. Or maybe Lena was getting older more quickly. So much had changed since those early days. In the beginning, she could always tell what he was thinking. Of course, since then, she'd given him plenty of mortar to build up a wall around himself.

He started unbuttoning his shirt. "I think I'm gonna go put those cabinets together."

She gave a startled laugh. "Really?" The kitchen had been torn apart for three months, mostly because Jared found a new reason every weekend to not work on it.

He let his shirt drop to the floor. "At least Ikea will know I'm still the man of the house."

Now that it was out there, Lena didn't know how to respond. "You know it's not like that." Even to her own ears, the excuse sounded weak. "It's just not."

“Really?”

Lena didn’t answer.

“Right.” Jared’s cell phone started to ring. He pulled it out of his pocket, checked the number, and declined the call.

“That your girlfriend?” Lena didn’t like the thinness in her tone. The joke wasn’t funny. They both knew that.

He rummaged through the dirty-clothes basket and found his jeans, one of his T-shirts.

“It’s almost midnight.” Lena looked at the bedside clock. “Past midnight.”

“I’m not sleepy.” He dressed quickly, tucking his phone into his back pocket. “I’ll keep the noise down.”

“You need your phone to put the cabinets together?”

“The charge is low.”

“Jared—”

“It won’t take long to finish.” He smiled that fake smile again. “Least I can do, right?”

Lena smiled back, holding up her glass in a toast.

He didn’t leave. “You should get in the shower before you fall down.”

She nodded, but couldn’t stop her eyes taking in the way the T-shirt clung to his chest, followed the definition of his abs. The vodka had given her a nice buzz. Her body was finally starting to relax. There was something about the way Jared was standing that brought old memories rushing back. Lena let her mind wander to a place she usually kept blocked off—the town where she’d lived before she moved with Jared to Macon, the city where she’d first learned how to be a cop.

Back in Grant County, Jared’s father had taught Lena everything she knew about being a police officer. Well, almost everything. Lena had a feeling the tricks she’d learned after Chief Jeffrey Tolliver’s death would’ve pissed him the hell off. For all the times he crossed the line, Jeffrey sure came down hard on Lena whenever he caught her skipping near it.

“Lee?” Jared asked. He had Jeffrey’s eyes, the same way of tilting his head to the side while he waited for her to answer him.

Lena finished the drink, though her head was swimming. “I love you.”

It was Jared’s turn to give a startled laugh.

She asked, “Aren’t you going to say you love me back?”

“Do you want me to?”

Lena didn't answer.

He gave a resigned sigh as he walked over to her. She was dressed in nothing but her bra and underwear, but he kissed her on the forehead the same way he did with his sister. “Don't fall asleep in the shower.”

Lena watched him go. He'd been wearing the same dirty T-shirt a lot lately. There were spots of yellow paint on the back and shoulders from where he'd started remodeling the spare bedroom three weeks ago.

Lena had told him not to paint the walls, to wait another few weeks—not because he had at least ten other projects in the house that needed to be finished first, but because it was bad luck.

Jared never listened to her.

Of course, she never listened to him, either.

Lena took the vodka bottle with her into the bathroom. She put the empty glass on the back of the toilet and drank straight from the bottle, her head tilting back. Probably not wise considering the pain pills she'd taken as soon as she walked through the front door, but Lena wasn't feeling particularly smart at the moment. She wanted the amnesia to come. She wanted the pills and the alcohol to erase everything from her mind—what had happened before the raid, during the raid, after. She wanted it all blanked out so that she could lie down and see darkness instead of that silent flickering movie that had haunted her for the last six days.

She put the bottle down on the back of the toilet. Her fingers felt thick as she pinned up her hair. Lena stared at her reflection in the mirror. There were dark circles under her eyes, and not just from the bruise. She pressed her fingers to the glass. Her face was starting to show the things she'd lost.

The number of bodies she'd left in her wake.

Lena looked down. Without realizing, she had pressed her palm to her flat stomach. As recently as nine days ago, there had been the beginning of a swell. Her pants had been tight. Her breasts had been sore. Jared hadn't been able to stop himself from touching her. Sometimes, Lena would wake up and find his hand resting on her belly, as if he was laying claim to what he'd created. The life he'd put inside of her.

But of course the life didn't stay there. His hand couldn't stop the wrenching pain that had ripped Lena from a deep sleep. His words couldn't comfort her as the blood flowed. In the bathroom. At the hospital. On the drive home. It was a red tide that left nothing but death in its wake.

And every time she walked by that fucking spare bedroom with its bright yellow walls, she was gripped by such a cold hate for him that she shivered with rage.

Lena stared up at the ceiling. She held her breath for a moment before letting it whisper out like a dark secret. Everything was getting to her today. The loss, the grief. The vodka and pills weren't helping. Would never help enough.

She searched for the cap to the bottle, but couldn't find it. Lena pulled open the door. The bedroom was empty. Jared's clothes were on the floor, exactly where they'd dropped when he took them off. Lena picked up his shirt. She smelled exhaust from the road, sweat and grease from riding all day. His pants still had his wallet in the back pocket. She took it out and put it on the bedside table. His front pockets were full. A handful of change. A small tin of Burt's beeswax to keep his lips from getting windburned. A couple of twenties, his driver's license, and three credit cards, all held together by a green rubber band. A small black velvet pouch that he kept his wedding ring in.

Lena dug her finger inside the pouch and pulled out the gold ring. Jared had stopped wearing it to work after one of his buddies had wiped out on his bike. The man's wedding ring had caught on his knuckle and ripped the skin off like a sock. After that, Lena had made Jared promise not to wear his ring while he was riding. The black pouch was a compromise. She'd told him to leave the ring at home, but her husband was romantic—much more so than any woman Lena had ever met—and he didn't like the idea of being without it.

She assumed now that he carried it around out of habit.

Lena returned the ring to the pouch and opened Jared's wallet. She'd given it to him their first year together, and he still carried it despite the fact that he'd never used a wallet before. It was really nothing more than a portable photo album. Lena thumbed past the many candid shots Jared had taken over the last five years: Lena in front of their house on the day they moved in, Lena on his bike, Jared and Lena at Disney World, a Braves game, the SEC play-offs, the national championship in Arizona.

She stopped on the photo from their wedding, which had taken place in a judge's chambers inside the Atlanta courthouse. Lena's uncle Hank stood on one side of her, Jared on the other. Beside Jared were his mother, stepfather, sister, grandmother, grandfather, two cousins, and an elementary school teacher who'd always kept in touch.

Everyone was dressed up but Lena, who was in a navy pantsuit she normally wore to work. Her hair was down, the brown curls hanging past her shoulders. She'd had her makeup done at the Lenox Macy's counter by a transexual who'd gone on and on about her skin tone. At least one woman had appreciated Lena that day. The sour look on Jared's mother's face explained why the groom hadn't insisted on a more formal affair. Somewhere right now in Alabama, Darnell Long was praying that her son would come to his senses and divorce the bitch he'd married.

Sometimes Lena wondered if she held on to Jared solely to spite the woman.

She flipped to the next picture, and her knees felt shaky.

Lena sat down on the bed.

She had seen the photo many times, just not in Jared's wallet. It was from the shoebox Lena kept in the closet. The picture was of her twin sister, Sibyl. Lena was struck by a painful ache of jealousy, and then she felt herself start to laugh. Jared obviously thought the picture was of Lena. He'd never met Sibyl. She'd been dead ten years when Jared came into Lena's life.

She put her hand to her mouth as the laugh turned into a sob. When Lena had found out she was pregnant, the first person she'd thought of was Sibyl. There was a brief spark of happiness as Lena had picked up the phone to call her sister.

And then the loss had sucker punched her in the chest.

Lena carefully wiped underneath her eyes as she stared at the photo. She could see why Jared had chosen it. Sibyl was sitting on a blanket in the park. Her mouth was open, head tilted back. She was laughing with full abandon—the kind of happiness Lena seldom showed. Their Mexican American grandmother's genes were on full display. Sibyl's skin was bronze from the sun. Her curly brown hair was down, the way Lena wore her hair today. Though Sibyl didn't have the highlights Lena had, and she certainly didn't have the few strands of gray.

What would Sibyl look like now? It was a question Lena had asked a lot over the years. She assumed it was something all twins wondered when one passed away. Sibyl had never had Lena's hard lines and sharp edges. There was always a softness to Sibyl's face, an openness that invited people in instead of pushing them away. Only a fool would mistake one twin for the other.

"Lee?"

She looked up at Jared as if it was perfectly normal for her to be sitting in her underwear crying over his wallet. He was standing in the doorway again, feet just shy of entering.

She asked, "Who was that call from? On your cell phone?"

"The number was blocked." He looped his thumbs through his tool belt as he leaned against the doorjamb. "You all right?"

"I'm ... uh ... " Her voice caught. "Tired."

Lena looked at Sibyl one last time before she closed the wallet. She felt tears streaming down her face. Her jaw tightened as she tried to force her emotions back down. No matter what she did, they kept bubbling up again, tightening her throat, squeezing like a band around her chest.

"Lee?" He still didn't come into the room.

Lena shook her head, willing him to go. She couldn't look at him, couldn't let Jared see her like this. She knew that breaking down was exactly what he'd been waiting for. Expecting.

Wanting.

But then something snapped inside of her. Another sob came out—deep, mournful. Lena couldn't fight it anymore, couldn't keep pushing him away. She didn't make Jared come to her. She crossed the room quickly, wrapping her arms around his shoulders, pressing her face to his chest.

"Lena—"

She kissed him. Her hands went to his face, touched his neck. Jared resisted at first, but he was a twenty-six-year-old man who'd spent the last week sleeping on the couch. It didn't take much for Lena to get a response. His calloused hands rubbed along her bare back. He pulled her closer, kissed her harder.

And then his whole body jerked away.

Blood sprayed into her mouth.

Lena heard the gunshot seconds later.

After Jared had been hit. After he collapsed against her.

He was too heavy. Lena stumbled, falling back onto the floor, Jared sprawled on top of her, pinning her down. She couldn't move. She tried to push him up, but another shot rang out. His body spasmed, lifting a few inches, then falling against her again.

Lena heard a high-pitched keening. It was coming from her own mouth. She scrambled out from under Jared, then grabbed him by his shirt to pull him out of the line of fire. She managed to move him a few feet before his tool belt got twisted up in the rug.

“No-no-no,” Lena stuttered before she clamped her hands over her mouth to stop the noise. She pressed her back to the wall, fighting a wave of hysteria. The vodka and pills caught up with her. Vomit roiled into the back of her throat. She wanted to scream. Needed to scream.

But she couldn’t.

Jared wasn’t moving. The noise from the gun still rang in her ears. Shotgun blast. The pellets had scattered, penetrating his back, his head. Bright red circles of blood spread into the dried yellow paint on his T-shirt. A screwdriver from his tool belt was jammed into his side. More blood was pooling underneath his body. She put her hand on his leg, felt the lean muscle of his calf.

“Jared?” she whispered. “Jared?”

His eyes stayed closed. Blood bubbled from his lips. His fingers quivered against the floor. She could see the tan line where he’d been wearing his wedding ring even though he promised her he wouldn’t.

Lena reached for his hand, then pulled back.

Footsteps.

The shooter was walking down the hallway. Slowly. Methodically. He was wearing boots. She could hear the echo of the wooden heel hitting the bare floorboards, then the softer scrape of the toe.

One step.

Another.

Silence.

The shooter raked back the shower curtain in the hall bathroom.

Lena’s eyes scanned the bedroom: The guns were locked in the safe. Her cell phone was on the other side of the room. They didn’t have a landline. The window was too out in the open. The bathroom was a deathtrap.

Jared’s cell phone.

She ran her hand up his leg, checked his pockets. Empty.

Empty. They were all empty.

The footsteps resumed, echoing down the hallway, the sound like twigs snapping.

And then—nothing.

He'd stopped outside the first bedroom. Two desks. Boxes of old case files. Jared always left the closet door open. The shooter could see it from the hallway.

He cleared his throat and spat on the floor.

He wanted Lena to know that he was coming.

She pressed her back against the wall, forced herself to stand up. She wasn't going to be sitting down when she died. She was going to be on her feet, fighting for her life, her husband's life.

The footsteps stopped again. The shooter was checking the next bedroom. Bright yellow walls. Closet door laid across a pair of sawhorses so Jared could paint balloons on it. From the hallway, you could see the thin pencil lines where he'd sketched them freehand. You could also see straight back inside the empty closet.

The shooter continued down the hall.

Lena's hand shook as she reached down to Jared. The hammer on his belt was already halfway out of its metal loop. She used her fingers to push it the rest of the way. Her hand wrapped around the grip. It felt warm, almost hot, against her skin.

Jared's eyelids fluttered open. He watched Lena as she stood up, pressed her back against the wall again. There was a glassy look to his gaze. Pain. Intense pain. It cut right through her. His mouth moved. Lena put her finger to her lips, willing him to be quiet, to play dead so that he wouldn't get shot again.

The footsteps stopped just shy of the bedroom door, maybe five feet away. The man's shadow preceded him into the room, casting half of Jared's body into darkness.

Lena turned the hammer around so that the claw was facing out. She heard the pump of a shotgun. The sound had its intended effect. She had to lock her knees so she didn't fall to the floor.

The shooter paused. His shadow wavered slightly, but didn't encroach farther into the room.

Lena tensed, counting off the seconds. One, two, three. The man did not enter. He was just standing there.

She tried to put herself in the shooter's head, figure out what he was thinking. Two cops. Both with guns they hadn't used. One was on the floor. The other hadn't moved, hadn't shot back, hadn't screamed or jumped out the window or charged him.

Lena's ears strained in the silence as they both waited.

Finally, the shooter took another step forward—short, tentative. Then another. The tip of the shotgun's barrel was the first thing Lena saw. Sawed off. The metal was rough-cut, freshly hewn. There was a pause, a slight adjustment as the shooter pivoted to the side. Lena saw that the hand supporting the barrel was tattooed. A black skull and crossbones filled the webbing between the thumb and forefinger.

One last, careful step.

Lena two-handed the hammer and swung it into the man's face.

The claw sank into his eye socket. She heard the crunch of bone as the sharpened steel splintered a path into his skull. The shotgun went off, blasting a hole in the wall. Lena tried to pull out the hammer for another blow, but the claw was caught in his head. The man staggered, tried to brace himself against the door. His fingers wrapped around her wrist. Blood poured from his eye, ran into his mouth, down his neck.

That was when Lena saw the second man. He was running down the hallway, a Smith & Wesson five-shot in his hand. Lena yanked on the hammer, using it like a handle to jerk the shooter in front of her, to use him as a shield. Three shots popped off in rapid succession; the shooter's body absorbed each hit. Lena gave him a hard shove backward into the second assailant. Both men stumbled. The S&W skittered across the floor.

Lena scooped up the shotgun. She pulled the trigger, but the shell was jammed. She tried the pump, worked to clear the chamber as the second guy climbed his way up to standing. He lunged for her, fingers grazing the muzzle of the gun before he fell to one knee.

Jared had grabbed his ankle. He held on tight, his arm shaking from the effort. The man reared back, started to bring down his fist on Jared's temple.

Lena flipped the shotgun around, grabbed it by the barrel and swung it like a bat at the man's head. Blood and teeth sprayed as his jaw snapped loose. He crashed to the floor.

"Jared!" Lena screamed, dropping down beside him. "Jared!"

He moaned. Blood dribbled from his mouth. His stare was blank, unseeing.

"It's okay," she told him. "It's okay."

He coughed. His body shuddered, then a violent seizure took hold.

"Jared!" she screamed. "Jared!" Lena's vision blurred as tears filled her eyes. She put her hands on each side of his face. "Look at me," she begged. "Just look at me."

Movement. She saw it out of the corner of her eye. The second man was inching toward the bed, trying to reach the gun. Half his body was paralyzed. He dragged himself with one arm, a wounded cockroach leaving a trail of blood.

Lena felt her heart stop. Something had changed. The air had shifted. The world had stopped spinning.

She looked down at her husband.

Jared's body had gone completely slack. His eyelids were closed to a slit. She touched his face, his mouth. Her hand shook so hard that her fingertips tapped against his skin.

Sibyl. Jeffrey. The baby.

Their baby.

Lena stood up.

She moved like a machine. The hammer was still embedded in the first man's face. Lena braced her foot on his forehead, wrapped her hands around the handle, and wrenched the claw loose.

The cockroach was still crawling toward the bed. His progress was incremental. Lena took her time, waiting until he was inches away from the gun to drop her knee into his back. She felt his ribs snap under her full weight. Broken teeth spewed from his mouth like chunks of wet sand.

Lena raised the hammer above her head. It came down on the man's spine with a splintering crack. He screamed, his arms shooting out, his body bucking underneath her. Lena held on, her mind focused, her body rigid with rage. She raised the hammer high above her head and aimed for the back of his skull, but then—suddenly—everything stopped.

The hammer wouldn't move. It was stuck in the air.

Lena looked behind her. There was a third man. He was tall, with a lanky build and strong hands that kept Lena from delivering the deathblow.

She was too shocked to respond. She knew this man. Knew exactly who he was.

He was dressed like a biker—bandanna around his head, chain hanging from his leather belt. He put a finger to his lips, the same as she had done to Jared moments before. There was a warning in his eyes, and underneath the warning, she saw genuine fear.

Slowly, Lena came back to herself. Her hearing first—the raspy sound of her own labored breathing. Then she felt the shooting pain from her tensed muscles, the singed skin of her palms where she'd grabbed the shotgun. The acrid smell of death flooded into her nose. And just underneath that, she caught the tinge of the open road, the familiar odor of exhaust and oil and sweat that Jared brought home with him every night.

Jared.

The back of his shirt was drenched, glued to his skin. The yellow spots of dried paint had disappeared. They were black now, just like his hair—darkened by blood.

Lena's body went limp. The fight had drained out of her. She lowered the hammer, let it fall to the floor.

Sirens pierced the air. Two, three, more than she could count.

A hoarse voice called from somewhere outside. "Dude, where you at?"

The sirens got louder. Closer.

Will Trent looked at Lena one last time, then left the room.

2.

THURSDAY

ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Hospital elevators were notoriously unreliable, but Dr. Sara Linton felt that the ones at Atlanta's Grady Memorial were particularly creaky. Still, like a gambling addict hitting a slot machine, she punched the button every time on the off chance that the doors would open.

"Come on," Sara mumbled, staring at the numbers above the doors, willing them to hit seven. She waited, hands tucked into the pockets of her white lab coat as the digital display showed ten, then nine, then stayed at a solid eight.

Sara tapped her foot. She looked at her watch. And then she felt her body fill with dread as she saw Oliver Gittings trotting toward her.

As a pediatric attending in Grady Hospital's emergency room, Sara was in charge of several students who—despite some evidence to the contrary—assumed that one day they would become doctors. Night shifts were particularly tedious. There was something about the moon that turned their little brains into mush. Sara often wondered how some of them managed to dress themselves, let alone get into medical school.

Oliver Gittings was one of the better examples. Or worse, as the case tended to be. In the last eight hours, he'd already spilled a urine sample on himself and accidentally sewn a sterile cloth onto the sleeve of his lab coat. At least she hoped it was accidental.

He called, "Dr. Linton—"

"This way," Sara told him, giving up on the elevator and heading toward the stairs.

"I'm glad I found you." Oliver ran after her like an eager puppy. "An interesting case came up."

Oliver thought all of his cases were interesting. She said, "Give me the highlights."

"Six-year-old girl," he began, pulling on the exit door twice before realizing that it opened outward. "Mom says the girl woke her up in the middle of the night for some water. They're going down the stairs. The girl starts to fall. Mom grabs her arm. Something pops. The girl starts screaming. Mom rushes her here."

Sara took the lead down the stairs. She guessed, "X-ray showed a spiral fracture?"

"Yes. The girl had a bruise on her arm here—"

Sara glanced back to see where he indicated. "So, you suspect abuse. Did you order a skeletal survey?"

"Yes, but radiology is backed up. My shift is almost over. I thought I'd go ahead and call D-FACS to get things moving."

Sara abruptly stopped her descent. The Division of Family and Children's Services. She asked, "You want to go ahead and put the kid in the system?"

Oliver shrugged, as if this was nothing. "The girl's too quiet. Mom's antsy, irritated. All she wants to know is when they can leave."

"How long have they been here?"

"I dunno. I think she was triaged around one."

Sara looked at her watch. "It's 5:58 in the morning. They've been here all night. I'd want to leave, too. What else?"

For the first time, Oliver seemed to doubt himself. "Well, the fracture—"

Sara continued down the stairs. "No specific fracture is pathognomonic to child abuse. You call D-FACS and it's a legal matter. If this mother is an abuser, you want to make sure she doesn't get away with it. You need corroborating evidence. Does the girl seem scared of her mother? Does she look you in the eye and answer questions? Are there other bruises? Developmental delays? Continence issues? Is there a history of ER visits? How did she present otherwise?" Oliver didn't immediately answer. Sara prompted, "Is she healthy? Well nourished?"

"Yes, but—"

"Stop." Sara wasn't looking for a discussion. She checked her watch again. "Dr. Connor is taking over for me, but you've got all of my numbers. Order the skeletal survey to see if there are any past breaks or fractures. Notify security to keep an eye on the mom. Call the other ERs to see if the girl's ever been admitted." Sara moderated her tone, trying to make it clear she was teaching him something, not punishing him. "Oliver, sixty-five percent of child abuse cases are flagged in emergency rooms. If you stay in pediatrics, this is the sort of thing you're going to be dealing with on a weekly basis. I'm not saying you're wrong. I'm just saying you need to know all the facts before you turn this girl's life upside down. And her mother's."

"Yes, ma'am." He headed down the stairs, hands tucked deep into his coat pockets.

Sara didn't immediately follow, cognizant that Oliver's ego was fragile enough without her snapping at his heels. Instead, she sat on the bottom stair and checked her hospital BlackBerry. Sara's eyes threatened to roll back in her head as she scrolled through the administrative detritus littering her mailbox. Meetings, conferences, denied requisitions, and new procedures for requisitioning, attending conferences, and scheduling meetings.

She felt around in her other pocket and traded the BlackBerry for her personal phone. This was much better. Her father had emailed a silly joke about snails that he'd heard at the Waffle House. Her mother had forwarded a recipe that was never going to happen. There was a long email from her sister with a picture of Sara's niece attached. She marked this unread and saved it for later. The next message was a text from Sara's boyfriend. An hour ago, he'd sent her a photo of his breakfast: six mini chocolate doughnuts, an egg and cheese biscuit, and a large Coke.

Sara didn't know which one of them was going to have a heart attack first.

The door popped open. Dr. Felix Connor stuck his head into the stairwell. He eyed Sara suspiciously. "Why do you look so happy?"

"Because I can go home now that you're finally here?"

"Gimme a minute to hit the can."

Sara dropped the phone back into her pocket as she stood. Oliver wasn't the only one who wanted to get out of here. Sara had pulled several night shifts in a row courtesy of a stomach flu that was running rampant through the hospital. She was beginning to feel punished for her own good health.

Home. Sleep. Silence. She was already making plans as she walked through the ER. Thanks to her crazy work schedule, Sara had four full days of freedom ahead of her. She could read a book. Take a run with her dogs. Remind her boyfriend why they were together.

This last bit widened her smile considerably. She got some curious looks in return. Not many people were happy to find themselves at Grady, which was the only publicly funded hospital left in Atlanta. The staff tended to take on the hardened demeanor of combat veterans. If practicing medicine was an uphill battle, working at Grady was on par with Guadalcanal. Stabbings, beatings, poisonings, rapes, shootings, murders, drug overdoses.

And that was just pediatrics.

Sara stopped at the computer by the nurses' station. She pulled up Oliver's patient on the monitor. The X-ray clearly showed where the child's right humerus had been twisted. Either the mom was being truthful about what had happened on the stairs or she was savvy enough to fabricate a believable lie.

Sara looked up, scanning the open-curtain area, which was predictably filled with repeat customers. Several drunks were sleeping off benders. There was a junkie who threatened to kill himself every time he got arrested and an older homeless woman who belonged in a mental hospital but knew how to game the system so she could stay on the streets. Oliver's little girl was curled up asleep on the last gurney. Her mother was in a chair beside her. She was sleeping, too, but her hand was laced through her daughter's. She hadn't yet noticed the security guard standing a few feet away.

Not for the first time, Sara wished that nature had devised a system to alert the rest of the world to people who were abusing children. A scarlet letter. A mark of the beast. Some sign that let decent people know these monsters couldn't be trusted.

Up until a few years ago, Sara had lived in a small town four hours south of Atlanta. She'd done double duty as the county's pediatrician and medical examiner. Her father liked to joke that between Sara's two jobs, she got them coming and going. While this was certainly true, too many times, Sara had been put in the position of witnessing firsthand the awful things people could do to children. The X-rays that showed repeatedly broken bones. The dental records revealing teeth that had rotted from neglect. The skin that was forever marked from burns and beatings.

Now that she was living in Atlanta, Sara had the additional knowledge that came from dating a man who'd grown up in state care. Sara's boyfriend didn't like to talk about his childhood. When she touched her fingers to the healed cigarette burns on his chest, or kissed the jagged scar on his upper lip where the skin had been punched in two, she could only imagine the hell he'd survived.

Still, there were far worse things that could happen to a child. The system was flawed in many ways, but it was also there for a reason.

"I wish you'd stop smiling." Felix Connor dried his hands with a paper towel as he walked toward Sara. "I gotta say, I'm still having a hard time shaking this flu."

Sara made her voice chipper. "Better sick at work than sick at home."

"Is that what you tell your patients?"

"Just the babies." Before Felix could come up with an excuse to leave, Sara started running down her cases. She was wrapping up the details on Oliver's patient when she felt a rush of heat come to the back of her neck. Sara glanced over her shoulder, feeling like she was being watched. She did a double take when she saw her boyfriend.

Will Trent was leaning against the wall. He was dressed in a charcoal three-piece suit that was nicely tailored to his lean body. His hands were in his pockets. His sandy-blond hair was damp, curving against the nape of his neck and stopping just shy of his collar.

He smiled at her.

Sara smiled back, feeling a familiar tingling in her chest. She had known Will for almost two years—met him in this very hospital—but lately their relationship had turned into something more. The depth of her feeling was an unexpected treasure. Sara had lost her husband five years ago. She had assumed she would spend the rest of her life alone.

And then she'd met Will.

Sara said, "Felix, I—" She glanced around, but he was gone.

Will pushed away from the wall and walked toward her. "You look nice.”

Sara laughed at the blatant lie. “What are you doing here? I thought you were working.”

“My briefing’s not for another hour.”

“Do you have time for second breakfast?”

Will slowly shook his head.

“Oh.” Sara realized he hadn’t just dropped by. She asked, “What’s wrong?”

“Maybe we could go somewhere?”

She led him toward the doctors’ lounge. The door was about thirty feet away, giving Sara just enough time to work up a full-on worry.

Will was a special agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. He’d been working undercover for the last ten days. He couldn’t—or wouldn’t—tell Sara the details of his assignment, but he kept calling from strange numbers and showing up at odd hours. She had no idea where he came from or where he was going, and anytime she asked, he either changed the subject or found a reason to leave. When Sara wasn’t busy feeling mildly annoyed by all this, she was consumed with fear that something bad was going to happen. Or had already happened. Sara’s late husband had been a cop. He was murdered in the line of duty, and losing him had almost killed her. The thought of the same thing happening to Will was too much to bear.

“Let me get that.” Will reached in front of Sara to open the door. Fortunately, the lounge was empty. He waited for her to sit down at the table before taking the chair across from her.

She repeated, “What’s wrong?”

Silently, he took her hand. Sara watched as Will ran his fingers along her palm, traced the inside of her wrist. Will watched, too, his deep blue eyes tracking the movement of his fingers. There was something about the way he watched himself touching her that made Sara’s skin start to tingle.

She stilled his hand. All she needed was for one of her students to walk in and find her purring like a cat. Besides, she recognized Will’s stalling tactics by now.

She leaned forward. “What is it?”

He gave a half-smile. “Diversion not working?”

“Almost,” she admitted.

Will took a deep breath and said, “My assignment got a little more complicated.”

Sara had been expecting as much, but she still needed a moment to absorb the information.

He said, “I can’t tell you why, but I’m going to be working longer hours. I won’t be able to make it back to Atlanta as much. See you as much.”

She wasn’t so sure Will couldn’t tell her about his job, but Sara didn’t want to spend what little time they had together rehashing what had proven to be a fruitless discussion.

She said, “Okay.”

“Good.” He looked down at their hands again. Sara followed his gaze. His wrists were tan, but only to the cuffs of his shirt. His hair was streaked with blond highlights. Whatever Will was doing, it required him to spend time in the sun.

“What I wanted to say,” he continued, “was that I didn’t want you to think I was disappearing on you. Or that I...” His voice trailed off. “I mean, what we’re doing.” Will stopped. “What we’ve been doing ...”

Sara waited.

“I didn’t want you to take my not being here for—” He seemed to be looking for the right words. “Lack of interest?” He kept staring down at their hands. “Because I am. Interested, I mean.”

Sara studied the top of his head, the way his hair grew in a spiral from the crown. There was going to come a point in the near future when she would no longer be able to accept his evasions. He would either have to open up to her or she would have to consider her options. The more Sara thought about it, the closer she felt to the looming crossroads.

She stopped thinking about it.

Instead, she said, “Just promise me that whatever you’re doing, you’re being careful.”

He nodded, but she would’ve felt better if he’d actually said the words. Will wasn’t the only detective in the relationship. The GBI was to the state of Georgia what the FBI was to the United States. Except in cases of drug trafficking or child abduction, the agency had to be specifically asked to work a case, and the local police departments didn’t tend to ask unless they were desperate.

Any way Sara looked at it, whatever crime had caused Will to go undercover was too dicey for the locals to handle. Worse, being undercover meant that Will’s partner wasn’t there to back him up. He was completely alone, probably surrounded by men with violent histories and addictions.

Will asked, "So, we're all right?"

Sara pressed her lips together, forcing back the words she really wanted to say. "Of course we're all right."

"Good." Will slumped back in his chair, his relief almost palpable. Not for the first time, Sara wondered how a man who'd spent his entire adult life solving puzzles could be so willfully obtuse in his private life.

She asked, "How long will this take?"

"Two, maybe three weeks."

She waited for more, but in the end, Will simply looked away. The gesture was artlessly executed, as if he was going through a checklist of casual movements. Blink. Scratch jaw. Feign interest in the notices on the wall.

Sara turned to look at the posters that suddenly held his rapt attention. They were typical to a hospital: warnings about HIV and hepatitis C alongside a rudely defaced hygiene series featuring SpongeBob SquarePants.

Sara turned back around. She'd never been good at passive-aggressive game play. "Can we at least acknowledge that there's something else going on? Because I can feel it, Will. There's something else to this and I think you're keeping it from me because you don't want me to worry."

To his credit, he didn't offer false protests. "Would it make you feel better?"

She nodded.

"All right."

Sara chewed her bottom lip. She waited for more, then remembered she wanted to leave the hospital before she was old enough to retire. "That's it?"

He shrugged.

She was too tired to keep pushing the boulder up the hill. "You are driving me absolutely crazy."

"In a good way?"

She squeezed his hand. "Not exactly."

He laughed, though they both knew she wasn't kidding. He asked, "Did you hear Homeland Security arrested SpongeBob at the airport?"

"Will."

"I'm serious. They showed it on the news this morning."

Sara groaned. "Public indecency?"

"That goes without saying, but the big charge was they caught him trying to take too many fluids onto the plane."

She shook her head. "That's awful."

"He said he was framed." Will paused for effect. "But it's obvious nobody hung him out to dry."

Sara kept shaking her head. "How long did it take for you to come up with that?"

Will leaned forward and kissed her—not an apologetic brush across the lips or a quick goodbye, but something longer, more meaningful.

Briefly, Sara considered the fact that the entire emergency room was on the other side of the door, that anyone could walk in on them, but then Will deepened the kiss and none of that mattered. He was out of his chair, on his knees in front of her. He pressed closer, pushing her back against the chair. Sara started to feel lightheaded.

"Jell-O cup!" a man screamed from the ER.

Sara jumped. Will sat back on his heels. He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand.

"Sorry," she apologized, as if she could control the patients. Sara straightened Will's collar, smoothed down his tie. She could feel his pulse pounding in the side of his neck. It matched her own beating heart. "The drunks are waking up."

"I like Jell-O, too."

"Will—"

"I should probably get to work." He stood up and brushed the grime off his pants. "Remember what I said, okay? I'm not going anywhere." He grinned. "I mean, I'm leaving now, but I'm coming back. As soon as I can. Okay?"

Her mind filled with things to tell him—that she wanted him to promise that he would stay out of harm's way, that she needed him to assure her that everything was going to be all right. Sara knew these promises would be meaningless at best and a burden at most. The last thing a cop needed to think about when he was in the line of fire was whether or not his girlfriend would approve.

In the end, she told him, "Okay."

He smiled at her, but again, Sara could tell that something was off. She could see it in his eyes—a hesitation, a concern. As usual, Will didn't give her time to question him.

She caught a glimpse of the crowded hallway as he opened the door and left. The morning rush had arrived. The cacophony of beeping monitors and machinery had started to rev. Patients were already parked on gurneys in the hallway. The drunk screamed for Jell-O again, then another screamed for the first one to shut up and also that he wanted some Jell-O.

Sara clasped her hands together in her lap, silently reviewing her conversation with Will. What was he really trying to tell her? Why had he come to the hospital when everything he'd said could've been relayed over the phone? At least he'd admitted something else was going on. He could be so damn inscrutable, and Sara was not too proud to admit that she often found herself outmaneuvered.

She touched her fingers to her lips, felt where Will's mouth had been. Was that the point of his visit? Was kissing her Will's way of making sure she didn't forget him while he was gone? Or was he marking his territory before he left town?

Only one of those options was flattering.

Sara's phone rang. She dug around in her pocket, feeling for the telltale vibration. She expected—hoped—that it was Will, but the caller ID read TALLADEGA CO, AL. Over the last week, he'd called from a lot of strange places, but never from Alabama.

Sara answered, "Hello?"

There was no response, just a low humming sound.

Sara tried again. "Hello?" There was still no response, but the humming got louder, more animal than electronic.

"Hello?" Sara was about to end the call, but, unreasonably, her mind flashed up the image of Will lying on the pavement, his body rent in two. She stood from the chair. "Will?"

There was a huff of air down the line.

"Hello?" Sara pulled open the door. She ran into the hall, nearly colliding with a patient. This was ridiculous. Will was fine. He'd just left less than two minutes ago. She could still feel his mouth on hers.

"Hello?" Sara pressed the phone to her ear. "Who is this?"

"S-s-s-ara?" The woman on the other end could barely speak.

Sara put her hand to her eyes, relief washing over her body. "Yes?"

“It’s ... it’s ... I’m sorry, I ...”

“Nell?” Sara quickly put together the pieces, recognizing the voice of her husband’s high school sweetheart. He’d had a child with Darnell Long, but not much else.

“Nell?” Sara repeated. “Are you okay?”

“It’s Jared!” the woman wailed. “Oh, God!”

Sara leaned back against the wall. Jared, her stepson. Sara had only met him a few times. He was a police officer, just as his father had been.

“I didn’t—” Nell’s voice caught. “I should’ve—”

“Nell, please. Tell me what—”

“I should’ve listened to you!” she cried. “She’s got him ... oh, God ...”

“Listened about—” Sara stopped. She knew exactly who Nell was talking about.

Lena Adams.

Sara’s husband had trained Lena fresh out of the academy, had taken her under his wing and promoted her to detective.

And in return for Jeffrey Tolliver’s trust, Lena Adams had gotten him killed.

Nell sobbed, “Oh, God, Sara! Please!”

“Nell,” Sara managed, her breath catching around the word. “Tell me. Tell me what happened.”

The woman was too hysterical to comply. “Why didn’t I listen to you? Why didn’t I forbid it? Why didn’t I ...” Her words dissolved into a heart-wrenching moan.

Sara forced air into her lungs. She could feel her chest shaking, her hands shaking. Her whole body vibrated with dread. “Nell, please. Just tell me what happened.”

3.

Will Trent stood in his boss's office on the top floor of City Hall East, looking out at the city. Atlanta was just waking up, the sun sparkling between the skyscrapers, commuters in BMWs and Audis honking their horns. Across the street, dozens of men were lined up outside the Home Depot shopping center. Will watched as, one after another, trucks pulled up and taillights glowed red. Hands shot out, fingers pointed, and two, three, sometimes four men at a time would jump into the back of the truck to begin the day's work.

Will could've had that life. There hadn't been much career advice at the Atlanta Children's Home. When Will turned eighteen, they'd given him a hundred dollars and a map to the homeless shelter. He'd spent the next several months jumping in and out of trucks, working construction or whatever jobs he could find. Will had been very lucky that the right kind of people had intervened. Otherwise, he never would've become an agent with the GBI. He wouldn't have his house or his car or his life.

He wouldn't have Sara.

Will turned away from the windows. He took in Amanda Wagner's office, which hadn't been altered much in the almost fifteen years that he'd worked for her. The location had moved a few times and the electronics had gotten sleeker as she worked her way up to deputy director of the GBI, but Amanda always decorated the same. Same photos on the wall. Same Oriental rug under her behemoth desk. Even her chair was the same squeaky old wood and leather contraption that looked like it belonged to George Bailey's nemesis in It's a Wonderful Life.

The flat-panel TV was one of her few concessions to modernity. Will found the remote and checked all the Atlanta news channels to see if they had picked up on what had happened in Macon last night. Less than a two-hour drive from the state capital, Macon was a fairly significant city, with more than 150,000 residents and a thriving university system. Because it was geographically at the heart of the state, the city served as a compromise for people who found Atlanta too busy and smaller towns too slow. In many ways, Macon was a better representation of Georgia than Atlanta. Art museums sat alongside junk stores. A handful of respected tech colleges were blocks away from expensive private schools that taught creationism. The visitors' bureau touted both the Tubman African American Museum as well as Hay House, an eighteen-thousand-square-foot antebellum home built by the keeper of the Confederate treasury.

Apparently, the Atlanta news stations didn't find Macon as interesting. Will turned off the television and put the remote back on Amanda's desk. He should be careful what he wished for. It was probably just a matter of time before all the channels were filled with the gory details about the attack on Jared Long. The Atlanta news producers probably hadn't yet gotten wind of the story. Sometimes it took a painfully long time for phone calls to be made, people to be told that their lives had been irrevocably changed.

Will had been sitting in his car outside of Grady Hospital when Sara's call came through. He'd never been anyone's first phone call before, but when something bad happened, Sara evidently thought of him. She was crying. She had to stop a few times before she could tell him the story, though she had no way of knowing that Will already knew. Could fill her in on some of the missing details.

Jared had been shot.

His life was hanging by a thread.

Lena was somehow involved.

Will had stared blankly out the windshield as he listened to Sara try to get the words out. His mind conjured up the image of Lena in that tiny bedroom. Half-naked. Covered in blood. Will had been panicked as he rushed down the hallway, careening off the walls. He felt as if he was watching a video moving in slow motion. Lena jammed her knee into the guy's back, arced the hammer high above her head. The slow motion got even slower as the hammer dropped down the first time. The hallway got longer. Will could've been running up a mountain of sand. He was moving closer, yet somehow every step seemed to take him farther away.

But Sara didn't know any of that. She just knew that Jared had been shot. That yet again, Lena Adams had been standing by while another good man had been targeted. It had happened to Sara's husband five years ago and now it had happened to her husband's son.

It wasn't a stretch for Sara to think it might happen to Will, too.

The frustrating part was that Will had specifically gone to the hospital this morning to come clean. He was going to tell Sara that he'd lied to her about his undercover assignment because he didn't want to worry her, and then he'd had to lie about where he was working so she wouldn't figure it out, and then he'd had to lie again and again until he'd realized that it would've been easier just to tell her the truth in the first place.

But then Will had seen her standing at the nurses' station and lost his nerve. Actually, he'd lost his breath. This was nothing new. Lately, every time he saw Sara Linton, Will literally felt like she had taken his breath away. That couldn't be good for his brain. He'd been oxygen-deprived. Obviously, that was why instead of confessing, he'd ended up on his knees kissing her like they were never going to see each other again.

Which might end up being the case. Will was painfully aware of the tenuous hold he had on the situation.

On Sara.

"You're late," Amanda Wagner said, scrolling through her BlackBerry as she entered her office.

Will didn't address the comment, which was automatic, something she generally said in lieu of hello. He told her, "I sent my report an hour ago."

"I've read it." Amanda's thumbs started working as she stood in the middle of the room responding to an email. She was dressed in a red suit, the skirt hitting just below her knee, white blouse neatly tucked into the waist. Her salt-and-pepper hair was in its usual helmet. Her nails were trimmed, the clear polish gleaming.

She looked well rested, though Will knew Amanda hadn't gotten much sleep last night. The Macon chief of police. The director of the GBI. The GBI crime scene unit. The GBI medical examiner. The GBI crime lab. They each had to be read in or sent out or relayed orders. And yet Amanda had managed to call Will back three more times before the sun came up. He could tell she was worried by the calmness of her tone, the way she spoke to him as if he'd gotten a flat tire on the side of the highway instead of walked into a bloodbath. Usually, Amanda took a certain joy in making Will miserable, but last night was different.

It was also fleeting.

"So." She finished the email and moved on to another. "Quite a mess you've gotten yourself into, Wilbur."

He wasn't sure which mess she was talking about.

"I don't have to tell you that we're not out on the limb anymore; we're on the thin part of the branch. The twig."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Whoever these men are, they don't mind going after cops." Amanda glanced up at him. "Try not to get yourself killed, won't you? I don't have the patience to break in someone new."

"Yes, ma'am."

She turned her attention back to her email. "Where's Faith?"

Faith Mitchell, Will's partner. "You said meet at seven-thirty." He checked his watch. "She's got six minutes."

"How wonderful. You've learned to tell time." Amanda continued reading as she went to her desk, sat in her chair. The old cushion made a sound like a pig snort. "I looped the director in on your midnight escapades. He's keeping a close eye on this."

Will didn't know how he was expected to respond to this information, so he took his seat, waiting for the next shoe to drop. Just recently, Will had come to accept that Amanda Wagner was the closest thing he would ever have to a mother—that is, if your mother was the type to lock you in a refrigerator or strap you into the back seat of her car and roll you into a lake.

She put down her BlackBerry and took off her reading glasses. "Anything you need to tell me?"

"No, ma'am."

Uncharacteristically, Amanda didn't press. She turned on her computer, waited for it to boot. Will guessed Amanda was in her mid to late sixties, but there really was no way of knowing her exact age. She was still in good shape, still capable of running circles around men half her age—or Will's age, to be exact. And yet watching her try to work a computer mouse was like watching a cat try to pick up a pebble.

She slapped the mouse against the desk, mumbling, "What is wrong with this thing?"

Will knew better than to offer his help. He brushed a speck of dirt off the knee of his trousers. It made him think about Sara. She was probably in her car by now, heading down to Macon. The drive was about an hour and a half. Will should've offered to take her. He could've confessed the whole sordid truth along the way.

And then Sara would've given him a choice: walk back to Atlanta or walk the rest of the way to Macon.

Amanda said, "You're brooding."

Will considered the description. "Don't you need the moors for that?"

"Clever." Amanda sat back in her chair, giving Will her full attention. "You investigated Lena Adams last year?"

"A year and a half ago," Will corrected. "Faith helped me. Lena's partner was stabbed. He practically bled out in the street. And then she arrested the suspect and he died in her custody."

"Reckless endangerment, negligence?"

"Yes," Will answered. "She was formally reprimanded, but she left Grant County a week later and joined the Macon force. They didn't seem to mind the taint."

Amanda picked at the stem of her glasses. Her voice got softer. "She was Jeffrey Tolliver's partner when he was murdered—what?—five, six years ago?"

Will stared out the window. He could feel her eyes lasering the side of his face.

She said, "There's an Eric Clapton song about telling the truth. Something about how the whole show is passing you by. Look into your heart. Et cetera."

Will cleared his throat. "It makes me very uncomfortable to think about you listening to Eric Clapton."

Amanda's sigh held a tinge of sadness that he didn't want to dwell on. "How exactly do you think this is going to end?"

He indicated the gray clouds that were suddenly crowding the sun. "I think it's going to rain."

"There's definitely a storm coming." Her tone quickly changed. "Ah, Major Branson. Thank you for making the drive."

Will stood as a woman wearing a dark blue police uniform came into the office. Ribbons and commendations filled her chest. A heavy-looking leather briefcase was in her hand. She was short and stocky, with her curly black hair shaved close to her head. She seemed about as happy to be here as Will.

Amanda made the introductions. "Special Agent Trent, this is Major Branson with the Macon Police Department. Denise is our liaison on the Jared Long shooting."

Will felt his bowels loosen. "I'm doing the investigation?"

A smile teased at Amanda's lips before she said, "No, Faith will take the lead."

"Already got it figured out?" Branson's temper sounded poised to uncoil. "I'm gonna be honest with you, Deputy Director. I'm not real happy with the idea of your people stomping around my patch like you own the place."

Amanda's tone stayed light. "Yet your chief sent you two hours north expressly to turn over all of your files."

"An hour and a half," Branson corrected. "And I may work for the man, but I don't always agree with him."

"Fair enough." Amanda indicated the chair in front of her desk. "Why don't we get our little pissing contest out of the way while Agent Trent fetches us some coffee?"

Branson sat, her briefcase clutched in her lap. Without looking at Will, she said, "Black, two sugars."

Amanda smiled her cat's smile. "Just black for me."

Will wasn't happy to be the designated fetcher, but he knew better than to linger. Outside the office, Caroline, Amanda's secretary, was sitting at her desk. She smiled at Will. "Cream. Two Sweet'N Lows."

Will saluted at her request as he walked into the hallway. His shoes sank into the padded carpet on the floor. He felt the chill of air-conditioning. City Hall East was housed in an old Sears building that had been built in the 1920s. When the city took over back in the nineties, only the important parts had been renovated, namely the executive suites. Three stories down in Will's shoebox of an office, the air was stale and likely toxic. The windows were rusted closed. The cracked asbestos tiles on the floor were scuffed red from the Georgia clay that had traveled in on nearly a hundred years of wingtips.

It wasn't just the air that was better on the top floor. The kitchen was a showplace, with dark cherry cabinets and stainless steel appliances. The coffeemaker looked like something a Transformer would shake off its leg. Will guessed the machine was the fancy kind that required pods. He checked the cabinets and found two boxes. He assumed Amanda drank the pink and orange Dunkin' Donuts high-test. The other box contained purple and yellow pods with flowers and vanilla beans emblazoned on the foil. Will took out three hazelnuts and shut the cabinet door.

After a few false starts, he figured out how to load a pod. Another minute passed before he managed to pry open the lid of the water tank and fill it to the line. He took three mugs off the hooks and waited for the water to boil.

Out of habit, Will opened the refrigerator door. There were a couple of paper bags in the fridge, but no old takeout containers or rotting food that smelled like it belonged in the morgue. Before Will started dating Sara, everything he ate was an on-the-go type of meal, whether it was a bowl of cereal he downed while standing over the sink or the hot dogs he bought at the gas station on his way home.

Now when Will went home, that usually meant Sara's apartment and something for dinner that didn't roll under a heat lamp all day.

Or it meant that for the time being.

Finally, the red light flashed on the coffee machine. Will pressed down the handle on the pod and watched the hot liquid squirt out. The smell reminded him of the cloying perfume some women wear in an attempt to hide the odor of cigarettes.

He refilled the water tank for another round. The hazelnut scent wafted into his nostrils as he stirred powdered creamer into the first mug. Will had never liked the taste of coffee, but he made Sara's for her every morning. She liked it strong with no fancy flavoring. He'd started to associate the smell with her.

Will put down the spoon and stared at the machine.

There was no use fighting it anymore. He gave in completely to thinking about Sara, letting his mind consider all the things he was going to lose. Feeling her long auburn hair tickle his face. Tracing his lips along the freckles at the small of her back. Watching her chest blush bright red when he touched her. Then there was the way she would sometimes kiss him, showing him with her mouth what she wanted him to do.

"Will?"

He looked up, surprised to find Faith Mitchell standing in the doorway.

She asked, "What's wrong? You look sick."

The red light was flashing. Will loaded another pod. "You want one?”

“If I have any more caffeine today, my head will explode.”

“Emma keep you up?”

Emma was Faith’s ten-month-old daughter. Will knew the baby was with her father this week, but he listened to Faith like it was the first time he was hearing the news.

“Anyway.” Faith rounded out the litany of complaints about her baby’s daddy by asking, “What do you think about coincidences?”

Will recognized a trick question when he heard one.

She said, “Like, you’re working an undercover case one minute and the next minute you’re sucked into another Lena Adams shit-storm.” She held out her hands in an open shrug. “Coincidence?”

“We always knew it was possible I’d run into her.”

“We did?” She raised her voice high on the last word, like she was questioning a toddler.

Will turned his attention back to the coffee machine. He slowed down his movements, feigning uncertainty so that Faith would take over.

Instead of taking the bait, she told him, “Sara called me about fifteen minutes ago.”

Will concentrated on filling the water tank precisely to the mark.

“She knows the state investigates officer-involved fatalities.”

He loaded up the next pod.

“She wanted to know what was going on with Jared.” Faith paused a moment, then added, “She didn’t want to bother you with it, but we both know she’s terrified of you getting mixed up with Lena, so ...” Faith shrugged. “I told her I’d look into it.”

Will cleared his throat. “That should be easy. Amanda’s putting you in charge of the investigation.”

“Well, great, but I didn’t know that when I told Sara. I was lying to her. Just like I was lying when I agreed that it’s a good thing you’re working undercover God-knows-where and you’re not going to get sucked into this, because I’m not sure if you know this, but Sara is terrified of you being around Lena.”

Will checked the kitchen drawers for sweeteners. He found two pink packets and tore off the tops.

Faith said, “You know Sara thinks Lena’s responsible for her husband’s murder. I pretty much agree with her, by the way.”

Will tapped the sweetener into the mug.

"She's also going to think it's Lena's fault that Jared was shot, which, considering her history, is a real possibility." Faith paused again. "Actually, it's a pattern now. I saw it back when you were investigating Lena Adams a year and a half ago. People who get close to her end up dead. Sara's right to be scared. Jared's just the latest casualty."

Will tossed the trash into the garbage can. Stainless steel, just like the appliances. He wondered if Amanda had used her own money.

Faith needled, "Jared, Sara's stepson by her dead husband who she thinks Lena got murdered."

The red light started flashing on the coffee machine. Will pressed down the handle on the pod. He tried the weather thing. "I think it's going to rain today."

Faith groaned. "You're a dumbass, you know that?"

He grimaced, mostly because he couldn't contradict her.

"It's not the case that's going to piss Sara off, it's the cover-up." Faith paused, but only for breath. "Actually, it won't piss her off. It'll hurt her. Devastate her. Which is a hell of a lot worse than her being mad. People get over being mad."

Will scooped up the three mugs in his hands. "Amanda's waiting."

Faith trailed him out of the kitchen. Will hunched his shoulders against the disappointment radiating off her, but she was blissfully silent as she followed him to Amanda's office. He knew better than to think this was over. Faith was probably itemizing in her head all the different ways she was right about this.

Sadly, there was nothing Will could say, because Faith was right. Sara wouldn't be angry. She would be hurt. She would be devastated. And then she would probably inventory the steaming load of crap Will had brought into her otherwise normal life and decide it wasn't worth it. His Dickensian childhood. What had happened to his family. His ardent desire not to discuss either topic no matter how gently Sara pressed. There just wasn't much to recommend him. Will had almost been kicked out of high school. He'd been homeless. He'd barely graduated from college. And this didn't even touch on Will's hateful wife, who had evaporated off the face of the earth the minute he'd filed divorce papers, yet still somehow managed to leave the occasional nasty message tucked under the windshield wiper of Sara's car.

Caroline was still at her desk. She helped Will move the mugs around, taking the one with cream. He realized he'd screwed up the orders at the same moment he realized he didn't care.

Unbelievably, the tension in Amanda's office was thicker than when Will had left. Amanda's jaw was set. Denise Branson's body was rigid, her hands clenched into fists. The pissing contest was far from over.

Amanda's tone could've cut through steel. "Major Branson, this is Special Agent Mitchell."

Oddly, Denise Branson smiled warmly at Faith. "I worked with your mother when I was a rookie. I hope she's enjoying her retirement?"

"Yes." Faith shook the woman's hand. "I'll tell Mama you asked after her."

Branson continued, "Evelyn was always the consummate professional." She still didn't look at Amanda, but they all took her meaning. "I'm sorry I don't have time to look her up while I'm in town."

Faith's perfunctory smile and lack of response made it clear she wasn't going to be so easily charmed away from Amanda's side.

To break the awkward moment, Will passed out the coffees. Amanda held the mug to her lips, then recoiled when the smell hit her. Branson noted the gesture and placed her mug on the desk.

Amanda said, "Let's try to keep this brief. We all have work to do."

Will waited for the women to sit, then leaned against the windowsill, feeling—literally—like the odd man out. He was used to being surrounded by women, but there was something about this particular group that made him feel the need to cross his legs.

Amanda began, "All right, let's start with this officer-involved ..." She searched for the appropriate word. "... hammering." She smiled on this last bit, though Will had seen firsthand why the observation wasn't funny. "Denise, any leads on why Adams and Long were targeted?"

"We have some theories."

They all waited, but Branson didn't share them.

"All right," Amanda said. "We'll need to review all recent case files, talk to their partners and team members and see if they can come up with any—”

“We’ve already done that,” Branson interrupted. “No one stood out. They’re police officers. They don’t get thank-you notes for arresting people.”

Amanda did not demure. “And yet they were targeted for a reason.”

“We’ve reviewed all of Adams’s cases going back twelve months. Same for Long. They’ve been doing mostly routine stuff. No dangerous work. Nothing that would draw this kind of attention.”

Amanda smirked. “Fascinating you were able to reach that conclusion in less than six hours.”

“We’re a crack team down in Macon.”

Amanda analyzed the woman. So did Will. Branson obviously relished the game, but her lips quivered at the corner when she was hiding something. It was almost as if she was fighting a smile.

Amanda asked, “You’ve met Charlie Reed?”

“That’s your forensics guy?” Branson shook her head. “Didn’t have a chance. Per your request to my chief, the house was sealed immediately after Jared Long was taken to the hospital. It didn’t seem like a good use of my time to drive over there and wait for your boys to mosey on down.”

“Thank you for your cooperation, Major. I’m sure it will help our investigation run more smoothly. Too many cooks and all that.” Amanda stopped to offer a canned smile. “The lab knows to rush any trace Charlie finds. He’ll report directly to me, and I’ll share anything relevant with your department. Faith is taking point on the investigation.” She told Faith, “Let’s be sure to keep Macon in the loop.”

“Yes, ma’am.” Faith took out her notebook and turned to a fresh page. “Major, what can you tell me?”

Branson had obviously come prepared. She told Amanda, “Go ahead and pull up those photos on the zip drive.”

Amanda raised an eyebrow at the order, but she still complied, moving the mouse around, looking at the TV set as if she expected something to happen. The screen stayed static. “Why isn’t this working?”

Will kept silent, but Faith asked, “Is it on?”

"Of course it's on." Amanda picked up the remote and pressed the red button. The screen flickered on, then a photograph came up. Will guessed he was looking at Jared Long's employment photo. He'd met the young man once before. Long was a handsome kid with the kind of charming self-confidence that made him a natural leader. From all reports, he was a lot like his father.

Branson provided, "Jared Long, Lena Adams's husband. He's a motorman, been on the Macon force seven years. Good at his job. Likes being on the bike. No red flags. Stellar officer."

Faith mumbled, "Unlike his wife."

If Branson heard the comment, she chose to ignore it. "Long is out of surgery as of half an hour ago. It's touch-and-go, but that doesn't change anything on our end. An officer was shot. Another was almost murdered. Someone put the hit out. Next picture, please."

Amanda clicked the mouse. She stared at the screen, waiting for the image to change. "Oh, for the love of—"

Faith said, "Hit the space bar."

"That won't work." Amanda tapped the space bar. The picture changed. The new photo showed an older man with a pockmarked face and squinty eyes. He was dressed in an orange prison jumper. There was a placard under his chin with his name and inmate number.

Branson supplied, "Samuel Marcus Lawrence, the first assailant who entered the house, DOA shortly thereafter. He's our first shooter. Mid-level thug with a couple of assaults that put him inside for two and three years, respectively. Early parole for good behavior, times two. He told anyone who'd listen that he was an ex-Hells Angel but there's no evidence he ever patched in."

Faith kept writing in her notebook as she asked, "Drugs?"

"Meth. He had more sores on his face than a backseat whore."

Amanda said, "Either way, he's dead now." She tapped the space bar again. Another mugshot came on screen. The man was about the same age as the first, with gray hair and the faded tattoo of a cobra's head folding into the turkey gizzard of his neck.

"Fred Leroy Zachary," Branson provided. "He did eight years for assault with a deadly, then pulled a full dime off a kidnap and rape. Known around town as a muscle for hire. He's alive, but just barely. His jaw was broken. Spine fractured. Ribs broken. Whole body's in a cast. Mouth's wired shut. He can't talk, and even if he could, his lawyer won't let him."

Amanda said, "Well, you can't accuse Adams of not being thorough. What did she have to say for herself?"

Branson turned cagey again. "Not much. Doctors said she was in shock. They had to treat her at the scene. She sketched out the highlights—one armed male breached the house. Long was shot in the back. Sawed-off shotgun, so the pellets spread. Adams took the hammer out of Long's tool belt and defended herself. A second armed male came at her. There was a struggle, but she managed to neutralize both intruders."

Branson seemed to be finished. Amanda asked, "That's it?"

"Like I said, Adams was under medical care for severe shock. She saw her husband get shot. Fought for her life. His life, too, come to that. We'll go back at her later, but from where I'm sitting, she's earned some breathing room."

Amanda silently steeped her fingers together underneath her chin. Faith kept writing in her notebook, but Will could practically see her ears perk up. There was a big piece missing from the end of the story. Either Lena had lied about Will being at the house or Branson was lying about what Lena had told her.

Amanda said, "Faith will go back at Adams. She's had enough breathing room, I think. We need to know exactly what happened last night. You may not like it, but it's our case and that's how it's going to be."

Branson's jaw tightened, but she gave a single nod of agreement.

Faith broke the tension this time. "Major, maybe you can fill in some basic details for me?" She turned to a fresh page in her notebook. "We're talking a residential area?" Branson nodded. "A shotgun goes off in the middle of the night. Anybody see anything? Hear anything?"

Branson apparently shared Amanda's habit of answering questions she didn't like in her own sweet time. She paused a moment longer than necessary, then said, "The neighbors weren't sure at first. It's a fairly rural area. Just past midnight, you hear a shot, maybe it's poachers, a car backfiring. The area's heavily wooded. Houses are on five-acre lots. We're not like y'all here in the city, stacked up on top of each other like rats."

Faith nodded, ignoring the dig, or maybe agreeing with it. "Who called the police?"

"A neighbor who lives four doors down. You've got her name and statement on the zip drive if your boss can figure out how to open it." She glanced Amanda's way, then turned back to Faith. "There's two other cops on that street. One's married to a paramedic, the other lives with a firefighter. That's the only reason Long didn't die at the scene. His heart had stopped by the time they got there. They took turns working on him until the ambulance arrived. Took almost twenty minutes."

Amanda said, "If Long comes around, Faith will interview him to see if his statement matches his wife's."

Branson waited another long moment. The corner of her lips quivered, then curved into a smile. "Aren't you curious how I know for a fact that your boy over there was in that house last night right when the murders went down?"

Will supposed he was the boy in question. He thought about the hammer, the way the blood was still warm when he grabbed the metal with his bare hand. The swirls of his fingerprints in the dried blood would've been like a neon light to a cop as seasoned as Denise Branson.

Amanda breathed out a heavy sigh. "I think we can call Will a man, since he's the only thing that stopped your detective from hammering a suspect to death. A second suspect, that is."

Branson snapped, "You think so?"

Amanda made a calculated guess. "I gather that despite my orders to keep your people out of my crime scene, you ran fingerprints?"

Branson straightened her shoulders, as if bracing herself for a fight. She'd probably sent a team to Lena's house the minute Amanda gave the order to lock it down. Will could only imagine the major's rage when his GBI file popped up on her computer. He couldn't blame the woman. Nobody liked realizing they'd been fooled.

"All right." Amanda turned to Will. "Our turn to share. Run down your evening for the major, please."

Will hadn't been expecting to contribute, but he said, "Last night, I was approached by a contact I've been working as part of an undercover operation. He told me he needed a lookout on a house robbery. No violence involved, the occupants weren't home. Obviously a lie on both counts. It looked like a good way to get inside the group, so I said yes.”

“You just happened to be in Macon?” Branson smirked when no one answered. “This contact got a name?”

Amanda supplied, “Anthony Dell.”

Branson didn’t acknowledge the answer. She prompted Will, “So, Dell said he had a job. What next?”

“We went to the job. Dell dropped me at the end of the street and told me to call on his cell if anyone approached. He drove down and parked in front of a house with a steep driveway. A light gray van was already parked on the street. Two males got out—I assume Zachary and Lawrence. They entered the house. Dell stayed outside by the van. I didn’t see that they were armed, but I was about fifty yards away.”

“That’s half a football field,” Branson noted. “Did you get the plates on the van?”

“It was midnight.”

“Full moon.”

“No streetlights. All I could see from where I was standing were shadows.”

Branson kept studying him, like she was trying to suss out a lie. Finally, she said, “The Kia that Dell was driving was still on scene when our units rolled up.”

Will felt his stomach drop. He had forgotten all about Tony’s car.

Branson continued, “We woke Dell up at his house this morning. He seemed real shocked that his car was missing from his driveway. Wanted to file a stolen vehicle report ASAP. We checked him for gunshot residue, ran his sheet, which was packed with low-level bullshit—but I’m sure you know that.”

“You let him go?” Amanda asked.

“What am I gonna hold him on? You gotta witness puts him at the scene?”

Will saw Amanda’s nostrils flare.

Branson continued, “I noticed Dell’s car’s got a sticker on the windshield—Macon General employee parking. Now, that rang a bell for me, because we did an investigation last month on some pills missing from the hospital pharmacy. Never did get any solid leads, but I know the GBI gets a copy of all reports pertaining to the theft of controlled substances. I made a trip to the hospital this morning to check out Dell's co-workers." She asked Will, "How do you like your job at the hospital?"

Amanda managed to sound both irritated and bored. "Yes, Major, excellent work. Bully for you. Where is Dell's Kia now?"

"It's in our garage. You told us to seal the house, not the street." She seemed to take great pleasure in telling Amanda, "I'll make certain to share any relevant information with your department."

"How kind. Thank you."

"You're welcome." Branson turned her attention back to Will. "Two males went inside the house, you and Dell stayed in the street. What next?"

Will had to think a second before he could pick back up where he left off. "I heard the shotgun go off. I ran toward the house."

"Half a football field away," she noted. "And then?"

"Dell tried to stop me from going in. We struggled for a while. I don't know how long, but he's stronger than he looks, and he was obviously freaked out. Several more shots went off while we were fighting."

Branson gave him the once-over. "You don't look like you've been in a fight."

"He was trying to stop me from going inside, not knock me out."

"Nice guy."

Will shrugged, but in the criminal world, Dell had been doing him a solid. He'd been trying to get Will to leave instead of running into a firestorm.

Will continued, "By the time I made it into the house, both men were neutralized. Lena Adams recognized me, or at least it seemed like she did. I got her to drop the hammer, then I went back outside. Dell was gone. The police were close by. I could hear the sirens. I went behind the house, jumped the fence into the woods, and walked away."

Will tucked his hands into his pockets as he leaned against the window. Technically, he hadn't walked, but they didn't need to know that Will had bolted through those woods like the hounds of hell were at his back.

Branson asked, "Have you had any contact with Lena Adams since you and your partner investigated her a year and a half ago?"

Will told the truth. "Neither one of us has laid eyes on Lena since the investigation ended."

"Have you talked to her since last night?"

Will shook his head, his mind flashing on the image of Lena's face when he'd put his finger to his lips, told her to be quiet. She'd apparently taken it to heart.

Branson said, "I find it interesting that without any coordination, Detective Adams chose to maintain your cover."

Faith pointed out, "It makes her look good, doesn't it? Instead of Will stopping her from braining guy number two, she stops herself."

Branson wasn't about to publicly pile onto one of her officers. "I'll put a BOLO on the gray van and get it out to the news stations."

"Late model," Will supplied. "Probably a Ford. No windows on the back or sides. Light gray, not dark."

Branson took her BlackBerry out of her briefcase. "And nothing on the license plate, even though you were right up on it before you went into the house." She started thumbing the information into an email.

Amanda asked, "You didn't search for vehicles registered to Lawrence and Zachary?"

Branson kept typing. "Of course I did. They've both been living in the same trailer park off I-16. Zachary rides a Harley. Lawrence drives a truck. Both were parked outside their respective shitholes. Neither one of them have a gray van registered to their names."

"They're from Macon?"

"Born and raised."

"Family been notified?"

"Lawrence has an ex who seemed real happy he was gone. Zachary has a brother waiting for the needle over in Holman. Killed a gas station attendant during a robbery. Murder runs in the family."

"It usually does." Amanda was obviously ready to end the meeting. "Looks like we've got work to do." She turned to Faith, saying, "Priority number one when you get to Macon is talking to Lena Adams, making sure she knows to keep her mouth shut about Will. You'll need to review her recent cases. I'm sure the major won't mind another set of eyes on the good work her people have already done. Talk to Adams's team, get some idea of what she's been up to. I wouldn't be surprised to learn she's been working off-book. See if anyone will talk."

Branson dropped her BlackBerry into her briefcase. "You'll have to interview her at the hospital. She won't leave Long's side. Said we'd have to take her away in handcuffs."

"That can be arranged," Faith offered. She'd worked behind the scenes on the previous Lena investigation and couldn't quite get past their inability to make the case stick. "Adams did attempt to murder a man."

Branson glared at her. "Are you not familiar with the Castle Doctrine, Agent Mitchell? The state guarantees a citizen's right to protect his or her home from an intruder. To my thinking, this episode is the very reason the law was passed in the first place."

Faith couldn't argue with the legalities, but she'd never been one to let go of a grudge. "Be that as it may, Major Branson, the way Lena Adams lives her life, she's gonna end up looking out from the wrong side of a cell eventually."

"I think the only thing Lena's looking at right now is how to get her husband to wake up. We all feel that way. Jared Long is a good cop. So is Lena for that matter, and it worries me, Agent Mitchell, that you're going into this thing thinking otherwise."

Faith bristled. "I'll go where the evidence leads me."

"Regardless," Amanda said. "We need to pin Lena down on protecting Will's cover. There's still a play to be made at that hospital, and given last night's events, this just got a hell of a lot more dangerous. Major, I expect you'll honor our request for confidentiality. We've spent too much time on this thing to have it blow up in our faces."

"This thing," Branson echoed, giving careful weight to the words.

Amanda was silent. She wasn't buying time; she was making Branson wait. For her part, Denise Branson looked ready to roll out a sleeping bag if that's what it took.

Finally, after what felt like a full minute, Amanda said, "Will?"

He looked her in the eye, wondering how much she expected him to reveal. She made an open gesture with her hand, as if to say he should hold nothing back. Of course, what she indicated for Branson and what she actually meant were two different things.

Will carefully bent the truth. "Several days ago, we got a tip that a high roller was making a move into Macon. Street name is Big Whitey. We ran him through the system and got a ping out of Florida, but not much else."

Branson asked, "Which part of Florida?"

"Sarasota."

"You got a picture?"

Will hesitated a moment too long. Amanda made a great show of opening one of her desk drawers, pulling out a surveillance photo. She slid it across her desk, saying, "This was taken four years ago."

Branson leaned over, making a point of studying the grainy image.

Will could describe the picture in his sleep. Big Whitey wore a Marlins baseball cap with the brim pulled low. His jacket was bulky, hardly what you'd expect in the Florida heat. Mirrored sunglasses wrapped around the top part of his face. His beard was dark and dense, showing very little skin. His hands were in his pockets. Big Whitey knew how to pose for a closed-circuit security camera. There was no way to tell how tall or short, white or not white, the man was.

Will explained, "Florida never laid eyes on him personally. This photo was taken off CCTV at a chicken joint on Tamiami Trail."

Branson asked, "Florida's sure this is Big Whitey?"

"One of the fry cooks gave him up. Said he recognized him from his local pill shop."

"Gave him up for what?"

Will pointed to the photo. "About half a minute after that image was captured, Whitey stepped back from the camera, shot a cop in the head, and escaped through the back exit, where a car was waiting."

Branson sounded dubious. "And Sarasota didn't go balls to the wall looking for a cop killer?"

"The fry cook didn't know much more than his street name. They were gonna go back at him the next day, but he was shot dead outside his house later that night."

"Sarasota let their only material witness go home?"

"They didn't know Whitey had made him, and they couldn't legally hold the guy without cause."

Amanda chimed in, "And Sarasota didn't put the pieces together on Big Whitey until the FDLE came in and did it for them.” Her tone dripped with sarcasm as she needlessly explained, “The Florida Department of Law Enforcement works much like the GBI. They coordinate cases across county lines. They’re very good at providing the whole picture, the kind of details the local force is too myopic to register.”

Again, Branson took a moment before asking, “Do you have any more details on this Big Whitey?”

Will said, “Nothing recent. FDLE thinks he was originally ganged up with the Palmetto Street Rollers. They were a Miami-based group, mostly Cuban, some Caucasian. The FBI put membership around twenty thousand running up and down the East Coast.” Branson nodded, so Will continued, “The gang broke up into sets after some turf wars. Florida believes but isn’t certain that Big Whitey took over from Sarasota down to the Keys. We’re guessing two years ago, he moved up the coast into Savannah and Hilton Head.”

“Guessing based on what?”

“Both Savannah and Hilton Head kept hearing his name come up. Snitches, mostly, but nothing concrete. At first, the locals thought he was an urban legend, a kind of go-to bogeyman. ‘Play it straight or Big Whitey will get you.’ ‘Wasn’t me, Officer, Big Whitey did it.’ ” Will added, “Savannah’s convinced he’s real, but Carolina disbanded the Hilton Head task force six months ago. Put the money on coastal trafficking instead, figured it was a wider net.”

“What persuaded Savannah that this Big Whitey’s not some kind of urban legend?” Branson obviously couldn’t resist adding, “Other than the excellent counter-myopic services of the great GBI?”

Will ignored the sarcasm. “They started to see a pattern. The junkies and cons were suddenly more sophisticated. Crime went up but prosecutions went down. The bad guys had more money for lawyers—usually the same lawyers from the same firms. Better cars, better clothes, bigger guns. Somebody took a bunch of low-level thugs and turned them into businessmen.”

“Ergo, Big Whitey is real,” Branson summed up. “All the bad guys in town played along?”

“Unless they wanted to end up face-down in the sand.” Will didn’t tell her that in their own way, many of the cops had played along, too. The detectives who didn't request transfers asked for early retirement. "Most of the criminals complied. They didn't become drug dealers to lose money."

"And now you think Big Whitey's trying to set up the same type of organization in Macon because you got a tip," Branson concluded. "I'm assuming Whitey specializes in pills, which Tony Dell was swiping from the hospital pharmacy?"

Will said, "That's a chunk of his business, but heroin is his end game. Whitey moves into the suburbs, branches out into the rich white neighborhoods. They start with pills, he moves them into heroin."

Branson asked, "How'd you target Dell in the first place?"

Amanda quipped, "Confidential source."

Branson didn't look at Amanda. "Same source who turned you on to Big Whitey?"

Amanda said, "That's how it usually works."

Branson kept ignoring her, asking Will, "And that's why you agreed to play lookout on the so-called robbery last night, to build your bad-boy cred with Dell?"

Will nodded.

"Well, that all makes sense. Thank you for your time." Branson picked up her briefcase from the floor and held it in her lap again. "You know how to get in touch with me, Deputy Director."

Amanda was seldom thrown, but Denise Branson had managed to surprise her. "That's it?"

"You're obviously not going to tell me anything else and I'm sure as shit not going to share anything with you." Branson stood. "If I'd wanted to get fucked around with this morning, I would've stayed in bed with my vibrator."

The woman knew how to make an exit. She kept her head held high as she left the office, her briefcase gripped close to her side.

Will looked at Amanda, who silently stared at the empty doorway.

"Wow." Faith broke the silence. "That was quite a show."

Amanda played with the stem of her reading glasses again. "She knew Lawrence fired the shotgun that took down Long. I expect we'll find she ordered some tests."

Will had picked up on that, too. "She was in the house at some point before it got locked down. She knew Lawrence had meth sores on his face, but he doesn't have them in the booking photo."

She called Dell Tony, not Anthony.”

Amanda said, “She had about two hours before Charlie and his team got to Macon. She’s obviously running a parallel investigation.” Amanda shot Will a pointed look. “And hell will freeze over before she tells us what—if anything—she finds in Dell’s car.”

Will nodded at the rebuke, which was deserved.

“I doubt the car will be useful.” Faith flipped back through her notes. “Branson obviously fingerprinted the bodies to get their IDs. Zachary and Lawrence weren’t stupid enough to go in with their wallets. They probably left them in the van.”

Will said, “Dell’s probably sold their credit cards by now. He’ll keep the licenses for his own use. The van’s probably been stripped for parts.” Leaving the Kia at the scene had been a risky move, but Tony Dell wasn’t the type to pass on an easy score.

Amanda asked Will, “Dell’s criminal record is petty—am I correct?”

“Yes,” Will answered. Tony Dell had been very lucky up until now. “He’s done jail time off some misdemeanors, but he’s never made it to the big house.”

“What’s your story when you see him?”

“I’m angry. Why did he lie about the job? What did he tell the cops? Should I leave town? Do I still get paid?”

“Good. Don’t oversell it.”

Will nodded again.

Faith sat back in her chair. “Why didn’t Lena tell Branson you were there?”

“I have no idea,” Will admitted. “I buy that she was in shock. Her pupils were blown. She was dripping sweat. She’d just killed one guy with her bare hands and was about to take out another.”

“Yes, how about that?” Amanda asked. “Let’s keep in mind she was fully prepared to commit cold-blooded murder.”

Will said, “Branson’s right about the Castle Doctrine. Two people came into Lena’s home and tried to kill her. She thought her husband was dead. She feared for her life. You could take it to trial, but there’s not a jury on earth who would convict her.” This was the problem with Lena Adams—or at least Will’s problem. He didn’t condone her actions, but at a gut level, he understood them.

Amanda’s tone was brisk. “I said let’s keep it in mind. I didn’t tell you to lock her up for it.” She told Faith, “See if you can get Will and Lena in the same room together. She might talk more openly with him.”

“That should be easy with Sara right down the hallway.” Faith stared her displeasure into Will. “And don’t forget who we’re dealing with. In case it’s not obvious, it still rankles me that Lena got away the last time. It wouldn’t surprise me a bit to find out this time around that she knows exactly why this happened and who ordered it. Maybe she skimmed cash from the wrong bust. Took kickbacks from the wrong bad guys. That could be why Major Branson’s doing her own investigation. Lena’s one of her team. Branson doesn’t want to look like the idiot who didn’t realize she had a dirty cop on her hands.”

“Lena’s not working the other side,” Will countered. He’d spent a lifetime dealing with damaged women like Lena Adams. Their motivations were easy to read once you knew what to look for. “She’d never take a bribe. She does bad things, but she always thinks she’s doing them for the right reason.”

“Whatever.” Faith had never been a fan of nuance. “Major Branson thinks the hospital pharmacy theft is the reason you ended up in Macon. She’s not going to stop until she finds out who your informant is.”

Amanda stated the obvious. “She’ll only know if someone tells her.”

Will said, “Don’t you think it’s strange she asked if we had a photo of Big Whitey?”

“Yes,” Amanda answered. “A picture isn’t the first thing I would ask about.”

Faith said, “She didn’t do that weird thing with her mouth when she saw it, but who the hell knows?” She closed her notebook. “What else do you think she’s not telling us?”

Amanda said, “More than we’re not telling her, which I find highly annoying.” She raised her voice. “Caroline, get me Gil Gonzalo at the FDLE.”

“He’s on central time,” Caroline shouted back. “Give it another half hour unless you want to talk to a junior officer.”

“I guess they work when they please down there,” Amanda grumbled. “Will, your report said Dell approached you around eleven-thirty last night. He took you straight to the job?”

“I was just coming off my hospital shift. He stopped me in the parking lot.” Will hadn’t considered the timing until now. “Maybe he needed me to fill in for someone else.”

Faith asked, “How did Dell pitch the job?”

“He asked if I wanted to make five hundred bucks cash for keeping my mouth shut and my eyes open.”

Faith said, “Five hundred bucks is a lot of money for being a lookout. You could get a guy killed for less than that.”

“You’re right.” Will was beginning to think he’d missed a lot of things last night. Adrenaline and sheer panic had never enhanced anyone’s short-term memory.

He said, “I noticed when they were outside Lena’s house that they all shook hands. Not the shoulder-bump bro thing, just a formal handshake, like they didn’t know each other well.”

Faith twisted her lips to the side as she considered the situation. “So, the plan was thrown together at the last minute. They didn’t have a crew in place.”

Will said, “Dell hangs out at a place called Tipsie’s just about every night. It’s a strip joint off the highway, caters mostly to bikers and ex-cons. I went with him a few times to build a rapport.”

“A rapport?” Faith echoed.

Will ignored her sarcasm. “If you’re looking for a guy to help you kill a couple of cops in Macon, Tipsie’s is the place to go.”

“I’ll check it out,” Faith said. “Hopefully, Macon PD will be more helpful than Major Branson. There’s something a little too go-getter about her for me. Who wears all their ribbons for a downtown meeting? And what was that snickery smile on her lips?”

Amanda told them, “This sounds like a character-building exercise. Attempted murder on two cops, one man dead, another critically wounded, and the chief sends her to brief us? That’s not a plum assignment.”

“Especially if she’s been up since one-shitty in the morning,” Faith pointed out. “For what it’s worth, Branson sounds to me like she’s on-side with Lena. Could be an ‘us against the world’ thing, like they’re both the same kind of bad.”

“Maybe,” Amanda allowed. “Misery loves company.”

Will tuned out their voices. He thought about last night, the drive to Lena’s house. Dell had been fidgety, but that was pretty much his default. He’d played with the radio, tapped his fingers on the dash, the steering wheel, his leg, as he drove one-handed toward what they both thought was an easy score. Dell had talked the entire time: about the weather, his ailing mother who lived in Texas, a woman at the hospital he was dying to sleep with. All Will had to do was nod occasionally to keep him going. Dell didn't need any more encouragement. He actually talked too much for his own good. Major Branson had been fed the story backward. Tony Dell was the original target of Will's investigation. His first day undercover, Dell would not shut up about a big-time dealer named Big Whitey.

Will realized that Amanda and Faith had gone silent.

Faith asked, "What is it?"

Will shook his head, but he still told them, "Big Whitey."

"It can't be coincidence," Amanda said. "You're down there for Dell. Dell turns you on to Big Whitey. Big Whitey kills cops. A little over a week later, two police officers are attacked."

Will said, "It's the timing that's bothering me. If I'm going to kill some cops, I don't do it on the fly. I plan it out. I follow them around. I figure out what their habits are. It would take several days, maybe a week, to get a team together. There must've been a clock ticking on the hit, otherwise they would've never used Dell and they sure as hell wouldn't've hired me sight unseen."

Faith asked, "You think some of their original crew chickened out?" She answered her own question. "It would make sense that they wouldn't tell you and Dell what they were really up to after their first choice walked away."

Will said, "That would explain the five hundred dollars. You overpay to keep the questions down and buy an easy yes." He went back to the timing. "Bad guys don't play the long game. This was something recent. The hit was put out in the last two weeks, maximum. So, we figure out what happened in the last two weeks."

"Macon is in Bibb County now." Amanda tapped some keys on her computer. "That's region ...?"

"Twelve," Will supplied.

Amanda raised her voice again. "Caroline, get me Nick Shelton on the phone."

Will said, "I've been reading the Macon paper every day." He ignored the surprised looks they gave him. "About a week ago, two cops were hurt raiding a shooting gallery that was selling mostly meth and pills. The details were sketchy. One's still in the hospital. The other's taking disability."

"Anything else?" Amanda asked.

"They netted some cash under the drug seizure rule. Paper didn't give an exact number, but Macon PD was talking about using it to buy new cruisers, some AKs for SWAT." Will shrugged again. "The rest was just the usual blotter stuff—missing teenage girls, pot bust at the school, a guy died on the toilet."

Amanda clasped her hands together on the desk. She was obviously done with talking. "All right. We have a plan?"

"My hospital shift starts at eleven." Will told Faith, "You'll have to figure out a way to get me and Lena in the same room without blowing my cover."

"I'm sure she'll cooperate." Faith sounded skeptical. She asked Amanda, "Do you think it's worth me going to the trailer park where Zachary and Lawrence lived?"

Amanda shook her head. "Branson's probably flipped the place upside down by now. Give it a day or two. Go in soft so there's a nice contrast."

"All right," Faith agreed. "Speaking of Branson, I'll double-check the information she gave us, run down the records on Zachary and Lawrence, make sure there's nothing she's leaving out. Might as well run Adams and Long while I'm at it. I'll send everything to data analysis so they can track down bank accounts, mortgages, known associates, family members, whatever else pops up."

Amanda said, "That's going to be a lot of information to sort through. Pull some help from the field office. Make them do the bulk of the work on Jared Long so we have a long paper trail if this goes to trial. We don't want to be accused of prejudicial thinking."

"You mean again?" Faith pushed herself up from her chair. "I'll call the cell phone company and get a list off the towers near Adams's house. Midnight in a rural area, there can't be that many active calls."

"Let me know if they give you any push-back," Amanda said. Cellular providers were getting stingy about data mining lately. "If we need a warrant, it'll take a few days."

"Amanda?" Caroline yelled. "Nick Shelton's on line two."

Amanda picked up the receiver, but she put it to her shoulder instead of her ear. “Will, be careful. Keep your phone on you at all times so we know exactly where you are.”

“Yes, ma’am.” He followed Faith toward the door.

“Also—” Amanda waited for them to turn back around. “Will’s right about the timing. Whatever set this off had to be recent. Faith, put together a timeline. Start with last night, then go backward day by day, minute by minute if you have to. Find out whatever the hell it is Lena Adams did to put all of this into motion.”

4.

MACON, GEORGIA

SEVEN DAYS AGO—THE DAY OF THE RAID

Dawn turned the morning light a cobalt blue as the raid van roared down a gravel road. There were ten cops in back, five on one side, five on the other, all jammed shoulder-to-shoulder so that every bump of the tires made them jerk in unison. The radio speakers were blaring Ice-T's "Cop Killer." The air inside the van vibrated with the raging beat.

Cop killer. Better you than me.

Lena Adams steadied her shotgun as they hit another rut in the road. She checked the Glock strapped to her thigh, made sure the Velcro held the gun tightly in place. The voice in her head screamed along with Ice-T's as they got closer to the target. She took a few quick breaths, not to clear her mind but to make it spin, to amp up the adrenaline and the absolute high that came from knowing she was a few moments away from the biggest bust of her career.

And then everything stopped.

The music snapped off. The red light came on over their heads. Silence.

Two minutes until arrival.

The van slowed. Gravel crunched under the tires. Guns were drawn, magazines checked. Helmets and protective glasses were adjusted. The smell of testosterone got thicker. Nine men and one woman. All of them suited in Kevlar vests and black fatigues, loaded up with enough ammo to take down a small army.

Lena breathed through her mouth, tasting the fear and excitement circling inside the van. She took in her team. Eyes wide. Pupils the size of dimes. The anticipation was almost sexual. She could feel the exhilaration building around her, the way everyone shifted in their seats, gripped their guns tighter in their hands. They'd been staking out the house for the last two weeks, had planned their attack even as the junkies and whores streamed in and out like ants on a mound. There would be piles of money. Percocet. Vicodin. Hillbilly heroin. Coke. Guns.

Lots of guns.

Overnight surveillance told them that four men were inside the house. One was a low-level thug on parole off assault charges. The second was a junkie scumbag who would suck off a dog to feed his Oxy habit. The third was Diego Nuñez, an old-school enforcer who enjoyed getting his hands dirty. The fourth was their leader, a bastard named Sid Waller who'd been questioned on a rape and two different murders but somehow managed to skate on all of them.

Waller was their main target. Lena had been tracking him for eight months, doing a masochistic hokeypokey—locking him up, letting him go, locking him up, letting him go.

Not this time.

The drugs and guns would put Sid away for twenty years, minimum, but Lena wanted more than that. She wanted him to know for the rest of his miserable life that a woman had cuffed him, jailed him, convicted him. Not that he would have a long life once Lena was finished. She wanted Sid Waller on death row. She wanted to watch them jam the needle in his arm. See that last flicker of life drain out of him. And she was betting her career on making that happen.

For two weeks, she'd been fighting the brass, pushing them to keep the operation going, pleading with them to extend the overtime, authorize the manpower, spend the money, and pull in the favors for the snitch who'd brought them all to this house in the middle of the woods.

Sid's crew wouldn't last long behind bars. Diego Nuñez would hold out, but the other two were junkies, and with Sid Waller out of the way, getting high would trump being loyal. In less than twenty-four hours, they'd both be scrambling to make deals, and Lena had a DA who was ready to hand them out. Sid Waller had killed a nineteen-year-old kid. He'd raped his own niece and slit his sister's throat when she'd called 911. Every cop in this van wanted to be the one to take him down.

Lena didn't bother with wanting it. She was actually going to do it.

She looked up at the ceiling, staring at the red light until it flickered off and then on again.

One minute.

Lena closed her eyes, going over the plan. They had pulled the records on the house. It was a foreclosure, one of many on the outskirts of town. Brick, which was good because it would stop bullets. The single-story structure was in the middle of two point-five acres bordered by a national forest on one side and a rural route on the other that bisected Macon and fed into Interstate 75, heading north into Atlanta. Searching the tax commissioner's office had netted them a builder's diagram: den, bathroom, and two bedrooms in the back. Dining room and kitchen in the front, with a set of stairs opposite the sink that led down into the basement.

They'd rehearsed the raid so many times that Lena saw it like a tightly choreographed dance. DeShawn Franklin and Mitch Cabello would breach the side door with a Monoshock Ram. Lena would take the front of the house with Paul Vickery, her partner for the last year. Eric Haigh and Keith McVale would clear the bathroom and two bedrooms in the back. DeShawn and Mitch would secure any prisoners. The remaining men would guard the perimeter of the house and make sure no one slipped out through a window or door. Lena had wanted at least eight more bodies on the team, but the operation was already pushing the million-dollar mark and Lena knew better than to ask the brass for more.

They always worked in twos; no one entered a room alone. The layout of the house was choppy, each room walled off with nothing but a door in and out. Back at the station, they'd taped off the garage, mapping the rooms to scale. Lena and Paul had two doorways to contend with before they reached the basement: den to dining room, dining room to kitchen. Each opening represented a new opportunity to get shot.

The basement was going to be the trickiest part. The builder's diagram showed a wide-open space, but that had been drawn in the fifties, when the house was built. Sometime in the last sixty years, the basement had been finished. There would be walls they didn't know about. Closed doors and closets. There was no door to the outside, only two narrow, boarded-up windows that a grown man couldn't fit through. The basement was a deathtrap.

Back at the station, they had drawn straws to see who would go down first. Lena's team had won, but that was only because she had been holding the straws.

The van downshifted to a crawl. There were no windows in the back, but Lena could see past the driver's head. The sun winked underneath the visor. A thick stand of pine trees arced around the side of the house. Aerial photos showed a straight shot to the rural route less than two hundred yards through the forest. If the bad guys decided to run, that was the direction they'd take, which was why two cruisers were assigned to patrolling that stretch of road.

The van stopped. Overhead, the red light flickered again, this time staying off.

Lena pumped her shotgun, loading a cartridge into the chamber. She checked the Glock again. Her team followed suit, checking their weapons. The driver, an old-timer named Kirk Davis, whispered into the radio, letting the brass know they'd arrived. The mobile command center was parked a mile away in the Piggly Wiggly parking lot. If history was any indication, Denise Branson would wait until Lena's team had secured the house, then roll in and take credit for everything.

So be it.

Lena's credit would come when she had Sid Waller on the ground, her foot on his neck, thick plastic zip ties cutting into his fat wrists. It was the only thing left in her life that she wanted to do—could do. It got her up in the morning and it went to her empty bed with her every night.

Lena grabbed the door handle, then looked back at the group, stared each man in the eye to make sure they were ready. There were nods all around. She pulled open the door.

And the dance began.

Lena jumped out first, heading toward the house at a fast trot. She heard footsteps pounding behind her—nine guys armed to the teeth and ready to break some heads. She kept her shotgun tight to her chest as she ran toward the carport. Her Glock tapped against her thigh. She scanned the woods around the house, took in the trash littering the ground, the broken bottles and cigarette butts.

The perimeter team swarmed into position. Lena led the rest of her men into the carport. They lined up two on each side. Paul Vickery jammed his shoulder against Lena's. He winked at her, like this was nothing, though she could see his chest heaving up and down underneath his vest. Inside the house, they heard the laugh track from a TV show, then music. The Jeffersons. "Movin' On Up."

Lena started the timer on her watch. She gave the nod to DeShawn and Mitch, who were holding the Monoshock, waiting for her signal.

They swung back the ram twice to build up momentum, then slammed the sixty-pound metal cylinder straight into the door. The wood splintered like glass.

Lena yelled, "Police!" as they rushed in—guns drawn, ready to light up the place.

But they were late to the party.

Two men sat on a yellow corduroy couch opposite the television. Their shirts were off. Jeans slung low. One had his hand tucked into his front pocket. The other guy held a can of beer. Both had their eyes open. Parted lips showed missing teeth. An array of handguns covered the battered coffee table in front of them.

Neither moved, or ever would again until the coroner came to pronounce them.

Their throats had been cut. The skin gaped open, showing white tips of vertebrae among the dark red sinew inside their necks.

Paul checked for pulses, though even from ten feet away, Lena could tell both men had been dead for hours. Waxy skin. The odor of decay. The junkie was one of the deceased—Elian Ramirez. His bare chest was concave, the ribs standing out like toothpicks. His murderer had saved him the cost of killing himself with Oxy.

Paul checked the second man, turning the head to get a better look at him. "Shit," he cursed. His disappointment spread around the room.

Diego Nuñez, Sid Waller's right-hand man. Lena watched a fly crawl across his eyeball. Nuñez's purple-black tongue lolled out of his mouth like a chow's. According to statements, Diego had taken his turn with Sid Waller's niece once his boss had finished with her. He'd been behind the wheel during the drive-by that killed a nineteen-year-old kid who'd been stupid enough to mouth off to Waller. Lena's guess was that, as a reward for good service, Diego had joined in on the fun with Waller's sister. The woman had been brutally raped and beaten before her throat was sliced open.

Murderer. Rapist. Thug. He'd died with a beer in his hand and his eyes glued to the TV.

"Shit," Paul repeated. He had found another body behind the couch. This one had been spared the slit throat, but part of his head was missing. It was a clean cut straight across. Lena guessed the ax leaning against the wall was the reason why. Long strands of hair and chunks of scalp and white bone were caked onto the edge of the blade.

Eric Haigh's hand clamped to his mouth. Vomit spewed between his fingers as he ran out the door. As far as Lena was concerned, he could keep running. She had little tolerance for weakness. And she sure as shit wasn't going to let her team get ambushed while they stood around with their thumbs up their asses.

She snapped her fingers for attention, the crisp sound cutting through the chorus booming from the TV. Lena pointed to the three corpses, then held up her hand, showing four fingers. Surveillance had four guys in the house. Sid Waller was yet to be found.

They didn't need further prompting. DeShawn guarded the door so there wouldn't be any surprises from the rear. Mitch took Eric's place and followed Keith into the back hallway. Lena headed for the dining room, Paul behind her.

They kept at a low crouch as they walked. Trash was scattered across the floor—mostly beer cans and empty fast food bags. The carpet underneath was thick with grime. It stuck to the soles of Lena's boots as she moved toward the open doorway to the dining room. She kept her tread light, mindful of the basement. She imagined Sid Waller down there, gun pointed up, listening for a sound he could shoot at.

The Jeffersons theme wound down with a gospel flourish. Lena could barely hear it over the sound of blood pumping in her ears as she stood to the side of the open dining room doorway. Her shoulder was against the wall. Plaster, lath, a few studs. Easily punctured by a nine-millimeter Parabellum, which Lena knew for a fact was Sid Waller's ammo of choice.

Paul tapped her leg twice, giving her the go signal. She spun around the doorframe in a low stance and pointed her shotgun into the room. There was no dining room table, just a bloodstained mattress on the floor with the usual detritus found in a shooting gallery. Crack pipes. Scorched aluminum foil. Spent hypodermics. The sharp vinegar smell of heroin burned Lena's nostrils. Water damage from a recent rain had caused the ceiling to collapse. There were chunks of plaster on the floor. The hardwood was warped, cupping like the hull of a canoe. Lena scanned upward, making sure no one was hiding in the rafters.

The room was empty. Through the broken window, Lena saw one of the other detectives in the front yard. He held his Colt AR-15 at chest level as he scanned back and forth like a pendulum. He stopped to shake his head at Lena, indicating no one had come out of the house.

She glanced back at Paul, then pointed toward the next doorway. This one was closed. The kitchen was beyond, then the basement door.

As rehearsed, Paul took the lead. Lena kept her shotgun braced against her shoulder as she walked backward, guarding the rear.

From the bedrooms, Mitch yelled, "Clear!"

Lena tapped Paul's leg, indicating he should go. His movements mirrored her earlier ones as he kicked open the door and pointed his Glock into the kitchen. Lena swiveled with her shotgun.

Empty.

None of the cabinets had doors. Half the ceiling had fallen down. The other half was stained dark brown. The sink had been pulled out. Plaster was missing where copper pipes and electrical wire had been ripped out of the walls and sold for scrap. The stench from the open drain was nauseating. Paul pointed his Glock into the ceiling as he checked for hiding places, then shook his head, indicating it was clear.

They both looked at the basement door.

This was unexpected.

There was a wooden brace like you'd find across a barn door. A two-by-four rested on two metal U-channels that were bolted to each side of the doorframe.

Paul gave Lena an inquisitive look. She could practically hear his thoughts. They'd talked a great deal about the basement door. In all the scenarios, they had assumed two things: the door would be locked and a bad guy would be standing on the other side with a loaded gun. The plan called for them to work with their backs to the wall—use the butt of the shotgun to break off the knob, the lock, or whatever was in their way, then yank open the door and rush into the hell that was waiting for them.

The bracing changed things, but maybe not too much.

Lena stood to the side, back flat to the wall as she used the muzzle of her shotgun to try to push up the wood. The fit was too tight. There was no way to slide it out. One of them would have to use both hands to heave it away, leaving his or her body as an open target to whoever might be standing on the other side of the door.

Lena didn't think about it for long. She tossed her shotgun to Paul. He caught it with his free hand, then backed up to give her cover.

She had to put her shoulder into moving the brace, kneeling down and pushing up. The damn thing was wedged in there. It wouldn't budge. She tried again, bending deep at the knees and exploding up. That worked—sort of. The board finally slipped free, but Lena stumbled back in the process, losing her balance and falling flat on her ass.

So much for the element of surprise.

The board clattered to the floor. Her tailbone felt like it had been cracked. There was a sharp, biting pain in her scalp where her head had met the sharp edge of the laminate counter. Her helmet had tipped forward, smashing her safety glasses into the bridge of her nose. Lena put her hand to the back of her head. The hair was wet. She looked at her fingers: blood.

Paul stared at her, his brow furrowed, like he couldn't understand how she'd screwed up something so easy. Lena couldn't either, but there was no time to figure it out. She pulled herself up, keeping an eye on the closed door. She tried to shake it off. Her vision was blurry. Her nose felt like a metronome was pounding inside. She took off the safety glasses. They were cracked at the bridge. She tossed them into one of the open cabinets.

There was a low whistle from the other room: Don't shoot. Keith came into the kitchen. Mitch followed. They were both big guys, their shoulders so wide that they made the kitchen feel more like a closet.

Lena felt a bead of sweat roll down the back of her neck. She used her hand to wipe it away. Her fingers were sticky. It wasn't sweat, it was blood.

Paul chewed his tongue between his front teeth, a tic she'd spotted their first week working together. It meant he was about to disagree with her. He didn't do it much, but when he did, he meant it.

Lena opened her mouth to take back command, but by some silent agreement, Mitch and Keith stepped forward, pulling out their flashlights as they stood on either side of the door. They all looked at Lena, but this time it was with irritation rather than expectancy.

Reluctantly, she moved over to the sink and jammed the shotgun to her shoulder so she could at least back them up. The laugh track on the television seemed to mock her. Lena couldn't make out the words, just the low rumble of Weezy's voice followed by a high-pitched response from George.

Mitch swung open the basement door. No one shot him, so he went down the stairs. Keith followed. Paul stood at the top, Glock pointing down in case someone managed to get past the combined four hundred-plus pounds of cop.

And then the waiting started.

Time changed. Even the particles in the air floated at a different frequency.

Paul didn't move. Sweat dripped from his hands, spotted the floor. Lena held her breath as she waited for some kind of resolution—guns firing, men yelling. Her head ticked down the seconds. Five. Ten. Another roar of laughter came from the television. Weezy again. Then Lionel.

Twenty seconds. Paul still hadn't moved. He was like a statue.

Lena quietly let out the breath she'd been holding. She inhaled again.

Thirty-five seconds.

Forty.

Finally, Keith called, "Clear."

Paul's hands lowered. Lena felt her lungs shake as she exhaled.

"Do the second sweep," she ordered, propping the shotgun against the counter so she could take off her helmet. There was a string of curses from below, but Lena didn't care. Three dead men were in the house—a house that had been under twenty-four-hour surveillance. She'd spent a million bucks of the department's money on this clusterfuck. She'd managed to rip open her scalp and bruise her nose. Her ass ached like a motherfucker. Her head was pounding. Meanwhile, Sid Waller was probably on a beach somewhere sipping a margarita and wondering which woman he was going to follow home and rape tonight.

Lena looked down at her watch. The timer was still running. They'd been in the house four minutes and thirty-two seconds.

"Shhh-it," Lena drew out the word. She looked up at the ceiling. The bare rafters showed white specks of mold. A clump of plastic bags was shoved into a hole in the asphalt shingles. She heard heavy footsteps in the next room as the rest of the team came in to see what had happened.

Lena raised her voice so it would carry through the house, ordering, "We clear out of here A-SAP. This is an active crime scene."

DeShawn called back, "Branson's on the way. Coroner's thirty minutes out."

"Great," she said. "The more the merrier."

Paul took off his helmet. He ran his hand through his sweaty hair. "You okay?"

Lena shook her head, too angry to speak. This was supposed to change things. This was supposed to make everything better. The only goddamn thing she had in her life right now that was working was her job, and she'd managed to screw that up, too.

She unstrapped the Velcro around her vest so she could breathe. Her shirt was stuck to her back. She knew her neck was covered with blood. This wouldn't stop with Denise Branson. The chief would want answers. The brass would show up. Internal Affairs. Lena would need to call her husband to bring her a change of clothes so she didn't look like she'd gotten her ass handed to her while they chewed her out. Not that Jared was answering her calls. Not that he probably even thought of himself as her husband anymore.

Lena covered her face with her hands. Shook her head. She had to get her shit together. She couldn't fall apart now.

"I'll back you up with Branson," Paul said. "Whatever you need."

Lena dropped her hands. "I need to know why that door was braced."

Paul's brow furrowed again. She could see he hadn't thought that far into it.

Lena said, "You butcher three guys and you get the hell out. You don't stick around inside the house. You don't barricade the basement." She indicated the door. "Look at the edge of the wood—somebody pounded it in." Lena wiped away the sweat pooling on her brow. The house was like a kiln. "Goddamn it. Branson's probably gonna bust me down to patrol for this."

"You and Jared can ride together."

"Go to hell."

"Hey." Paul put his Glock on the counter. His hand was on her arm, then her face. He smiled at her, trying to make everything okay.

Lena pulled away from him. She stamped her boot on the floor so they'd hear her in the basement. "Cabello? McVale? What's taking so long down there?"

"Found some money!" Keith called back. "We're rich!"

"Thank God." Lena headed toward the basement. "Please let it be a million dollars." A drug seizure like that would at least pay for all the overtime.

She told Paul, "Get everybody out of the house. Tell CSU they're gonna need to bring lights. I want to talk to the coroner when he gets here."

He gave her a curt salute. "Yes, boss."

Lena took her Maglite out of her pants pocket as she headed downstairs. She searched the wall for a light switch as she reached the bottom landing. The electrical panel was open. She could see old fuses plugged into slots. She tapped a few, but nothing happened.

As predicted, the basement had been chopped into tiny rooms. The beam of Lena's flashlight picked up buckling, cheap paneling, and busted-open bags of trash that had been tossed down the stairs. The back of the stairs was open, empty but for more trash. There was no hallway, just a series of open doors, one room leading directly into the other. There were four doorways in all, so five rooms, counting the one she was standing in.

She saw a soft glow of light in the distance, probably Keith and Mitch counting the stash of money in the last room. Lena's eyes blurred on the light. She put her hand to the back of her head, suppressing a string of curses. The blood was coming out in a steady stream. She would probably need stitches. Her head throbbed with pain. Her nose felt cracked. The day's humiliations were piling up. Her only chance of salvaging the operation was finding a mound of hundred-dollar bills that was high enough to touch the ceiling.

Lena opened her mouth to call to the guys, but something stopped her. Sixth sense. Cop's intuition. There were no voices. Keith and Mitch couldn't take a dump without narrating it for all to hear. They'd found a pile of cash and weren't joking about how they were going to spend it?

Something wasn't right.

Lena's hand wrapped around her Glock. She turned off the flashlight, then waited for her eyes to adjust to the darkness.

She strained to pick up sounds, trying to block out the noise from the television set upstairs.

Nothing.

She made her way into the next room. As carefully as Lena moved, it was impossible to not make a sound. There was too much trash on the floor—empty beer cans, glass crack pipes, aluminum foil. The carpet was thick and wet, like a suction cup against the soles of her boots. Every sound was amplified in the crowded space. She might as well start singing.

No.

What she really should do is go upstairs and get backup. You never went into a room alone. You always worked in pairs. Lena was breaking her own cardinal rule.

But she'd already fallen on her ass, cut open her head, and spent a fortune capturing three dead men and securing a crime scene that probably contained more DNA than a men's toilet at the local truck stop. She wasn't going to risk what was left of her reputation based on feeling some bad juju.

Still, Lena felt for the loose strap around her Kevlar vest and pulled it tight against her waist. She moved forward, her knees bent, her center of gravity low in case she had to dive to the ground or fight off an attacker. The closer she got to the last room, the more certain she was that something had gone horribly wrong.

Twenty feet. Fifteen. Lena was approximately ten feet away when she saw the tip of a boot. Black leather. Steel toe. It was just like the one she was wearing, only three sizes larger.

And pointing up toward the ceiling.

Lena froze. She blinked her eyes. Her vision doubled. Blood was pooling up around the collar of her vest. Her mouth was bone-dry.

She took another step. Lena could just make out the floor in front of her. The flashlights from the other room were walleyed, one pointing toward the door, the other toward the wall. There was a suitcase opposite the door. Money spilled out onto the floor. Hundreds, just like she'd prayed for.

Lena two-handed the Glock. She wasn't sweating anymore. She didn't feel any fear. All extraneous thought left her mind. She counted out her steps—one, then two, then she was in the last room and pointing her gun at Sid Waller.

He had Keith in a choke hold, the muzzle of a Sig Sauer nine-millimeter jammed into the man's neck. Mitch was flat on his back. His scalp was ripped open. Blood covered his face.

From the moment they put a gun in your hand at the academy, they taught you to always rest your finger on the trigger guard, never on the trigger. This gave your brain a few extra milliseconds to process what you were looking at, to tell whether or not you were drawing down on friend or foe. You never put your finger on the trigger unless you were ready to shoot someone.

Lena put her finger on the trigger.

"Get back," Sid Waller ordered.

Lena shook her head. "No."

He made a show of tightening his grip on the Sig. "I want a car. I want the road cleared."

"You're not getting anything." Keith's eyes went wide as Lena took another step closer. "Let him go."

"Get a negotiator."

"I'm your negotiator," she told him. "Let him go or die."

"Back up." Waller jammed the Sig harder into Keith's neck.

"I'll do it."

"Do it." She took another step forward. There was no way in hell she was letting him take Keith out of this basement. "You're gonna kill him either way. Do it now so I can go ahead and kill you."

"I mean it."

"So do I."

Waller's eyes turned jittery. This wasn't the first time he'd stared down Lena, but it was the first time he'd done it with a gun pointed at his head. "You're fucking crazy."

"You're fucking right." Lena took another step forward. She felt numb, like she was watching someone else do this. A different woman held her Glock. A different woman stared down this murderer, this child rapist. "Put the gun down."

Keith let out a sob. He whispered, "Please ..."

Waller turned the Sig on Lena. "I'll kill you, then. How about that?"

She glanced into the dark nothingness of the muzzle. "See if you make it up those stairs."

"Back the fuck up!" Waller screamed, spit flying from his mouth. "I'll do it!"

"Do it." Lena was less than two feet away.

"I will!"

"Do it!" she screamed. "Pull the trigger, you fucking pussy!"

Waller's hand moved quickly. There wasn't even a blur. One second, the Sig was pointed at Lena, the next it was pressed to his head. His finger jerked. There was a flash, and the side of his head exploded.

"Jesus Christ!" Keith slapped at the pieces of skull and brain that had sprayed his neck. "Christ!" He scrambled to get away, his feet sliding on the wet carpet.

Lena braced her hand against the wall. All the buzz left her body. "Check on Mitch."

"Fuck!" Keith pushed himself up, stumbled from the room.

"Jesus!"

"Lee?" Paul trampled down the stairs, his voice filled with panic.

"Get the paramedics!" she shouted back. Lena knelt down beside Mitch, made sure he knew she was there. "Take it easy," she managed. "We're getting help."

Mitch coughed. His chest heaved from the effort. His eyes were as wild as Keith's.

“What the—” Paul took in the scene with visible shock. “What —” He didn’t say anything else, just kicked the gun out of Waller’s hand like a guy with half his head missing was still a threat.

DeShawn’s voice came from the other side of the basement. “Y’all okay?”

“We’re okay. Stay where you are.” Lena sat back on her heels, slid her Glock back into the holster. She told Paul, “Waller shot himself in the head.”

“No shit,” Paul said. “Mitch? Are you—”

“Get me outta here.” Mitch reached up, touched his fingers to the bare bone of his skull. He stared at Lena. She couldn’t read his expression. Either he was terrified or impressed. She still wasn’t sure when he told her, “You gotta fuckin’ death wish.”

“Come on.” Paul folded Mitch’s scalp back into place like it was a piece of cloth. “Can you stand up?”

Mitch tried, but Paul did most of the lifting, telling Lena, “Branson’s five minutes out.”

Lena felt something tickle her neck. She put her fingers to the spot and rubbed away the grit of Sid Waller’s brain. Flashlight beams came from the other end of the basement. Lena guessed most of the team had come down the stairs when they heard the gunshot.

She shouted, “Jesus Christ, get out of here! Why do I have to keep reminding everybody that this is an active crime scene?”

There were grumbles of protest, but no one challenged the order.

Paul told her, “IA is gonna be all over this.”

Lena didn’t answer. She was no stranger to Internal Affairs.

“I’ll talk to Keith, make sure he’s on board.” Paul looped Mitch’s arm around his shoulders. He asked Lena, “You got your story straight?”

“Just get Mitch upstairs.”

Paul practically lifted Mitch’s feet off the ground as they staggered toward the basement stairs. The climb was cumbersome, but a couple of men had obviously disobeyed Lena’s orders and stuck around to help Paul carry Mitch out. She heard them walk clumsily through the kitchen, then they were finally gone.

The house was silent. The wood creaked and flexed as the temperature started to change. The sun was coming up fast. There was a hint of white light seeping around the edges of the boarded-up windows.

All of Lena's energy had drained. Her vision was still hazy. The room felt off-kilter. A sense of separateness took hold. The aloneness turned lonely. She wanted Jared. She wanted him to rush into the room and put his arms around her. If she thought about it hard enough, she could almost feel his hands rubbing her back, hear his calming voice in her ear.

Lena wiped away tears. Why did she ache for Jared so much when he wasn't there, yet every time he was standing in front of her, all she could think about was how much she wanted him to leave?

She looked down. Her hand had gone to her stomach again. Her palm flat to her belly.

Lena shook her head, tried to make herself focus because Paul was right about one thing: the minute Branson got down here, she'd want a clear story. Three men had been murdered in the night while the cops were sitting in a surveillance truck less than five hundred yards away. Keith was probably still shitting himself from having a gun jammed into his neck. Mitch had almost been scalped. Sid Waller was dead by his own hand.

What could Lena say? That part of her had been hoping Sid Waller would kill her? That just about everybody in Lena's life would be better off if he had?

No. She would tell Branson that she had followed her training. You didn't leave a hostage with a madman. You didn't let them go to a second location. You took your shot when you could.

Or, you let the bad guy take his shot.

She turned her flashlight on Sid Waller. His mouth was open. She could see the titanium cap on his front tooth. There was a skull and crossbones etched into it. Lena had seen it enough times during interrogations to draw it from memory. Waller would sit at the table with his legs spread wide like his balls needed the extra room. He barely looked at Lena, but when he did, he conveyed such a sense of disgust that she felt dirty just being near him. Even with his lawyer there, he would sneer at her, spit at her, call her a stupid cunt. It drove Paul insane, but Lena just let it slide. Waller wanted a reaction. He wanted her to lunge at him so he could laugh in her face. You didn't have to be a genius to recognize a man who hated women. The bastard would rather kill himself than be taken in by one.

She trained the flashlight on the gleaming wet hole where the side of Waller's head used to be.

Wish granted.

Lena turned away from the body, shining the light into the suitcase. She'd been wrong about that—there were more fifties than hundreds. Maybe half a million dollars. Denise Branson would have to fill her chest with all her ribbons and commendations again for when they put her picture in the paper. The fact that two seasoned cops had let the bad guy get the drop on them wouldn't be part of the story.

Lena wanted the question answered, though. Mitch and Keith were better than this. At least she thought they were. She scanned the room with her Maglite, trying to figure out what had happened. There was a piece of paneling hanging crookedly off the wall. She craned her neck to see behind it. Waller's hiding place. The earth was dug out around the foundation. Like rats in a trap, Keith and Mitch had gone straight to the money, and Sid Waller had sprung out from behind the wall and taken them both down before they could make a squeak.

Mitch first, probably brained with the muzzle of the Sig. Then the next thing Keith knows, the Sig is jammed in his throat. Much more frightening than the thought of getting shot in the head. You get shot in the neck, you might live. You might never walk again, you might breathe through a tube or piss in a bag for the rest of your life, but you'd live.

Someone was on the stairs. Lena waited for Denise Branson to pick her way through the filthy basement.

"Adams? What the hell happened here?" Denise yelled. "You're gonna be damn lucky if Chief Gray doesn't bust your ass over this."

Lena had heard the threat before, and from people a lot scarier than Denise Branson. She answered, "Waller took Keith hostage. He pointed the gun at me. I pointed my gun at him. He made a choice."

Denise scowled at Waller's dead body. She looked mad enough to spit. "Who do you think is gonna give us Big Whitey now?"

Lena was so sick and tired of hearing that fucking name. "Denise, I really don't give a shit."

“You best check that attitude before I—”

She stopped.

There was a sound. They both heard it. Waller’s hiding place. There was something else behind the wall.

Lena’s Glock was in her hand. She couldn’t even remember pulling it.

Denise moved more slowly. She stepped back, drew her side-arm.

The sound came again. Lena moved to the right, tried to use her flashlight to see behind the panel. Just like before, she had her shoulder to the wall. She knelt down, angling the light. The whole left side of the hole was obscured. All Lena saw was wet, black earth and a filthy, wadded-up athletic sock.

Lena stood back up. The two women stared at each other. Predictably, Denise nodded for Lena to take lead.

Lena waited for the numbness to come back, the autopilot to take over. It didn’t—or wouldn’t. All the bravado from before had evaporated away. Her body didn’t want to move. Five minutes ago, she’d had a death wish, but now that the opportunity had presented itself again, she found herself unwilling.

Denise made a hissing sound between her teeth. Lena turned to look at her. The major was waiting, gun pointed low, finger resting on the trigger guard. Her eyes went wide. Her lips parted, showing her teeth.

Lena turned back around. She looked at the dirty, wet sock, the dark hole Sid Waller had crawled out of.

The sound came again.

No more thinking.

Lena pulled back the panel.

5.

Sara had only visited Macon a handful of times, but she'd always gotten the impression that the city was one forever stuck in limbo, caught between the liberal state capital less than one hundred miles north and the smaller, more conservative towns that made up the majority of the state. Most Atlantans never gave Macon a second thought, but everything about Macon seemed to strain with the need to impress its wealthier neighbor.

Macon General Hospital was a perfect example of this endless striving. Even as Sara pulled into the freshly paved parking lot, she couldn't help but notice the difference in scale between the towering monolith of Grady and the three architecturally ornate brick buildings that made up the much smaller county medical complex. Up until the 1960s, Grady had been segregated into two different wards—one for black and one for white. As with many areas in the modern South, a different sort of segregation had taken hold in Macon. It wasn't about race anymore, but class. All were welcome so long as they could afford the entrance fee.

Sara didn't realize she had driven to the back of the parking lot until she noticed the exit signs. She pulled into a space under some trees. For a few minutes, she just sat in the car, trying to decide what to do next. Then her brain took over and made her hand open the door, her feet hit the asphalt, her legs move as she walked toward the hospital. The large fountain in the middle of the circular drive sent up a wet mist as she passed by. The rhythmic lapping of water was probably meant to calm visitors, but to Sara, the sound only managed to further set her teeth on edge.

She felt time roll back as she walked toward the front doors of the main hospital building—not by decades, but by years. Just like that, she was in Grant County again, transported back to the day her husband had been murdered. Sara's body made the connection before her brain did. It was probably all the police officers, a sea of blue that filled the parking lot, the front entrance, the lobby.

The sight of them sent a jolt of adrenaline straight into Sara's heart. Her ears filled with a high-pitched ringing. Her head ached. Her muscles twitched. It was as if all the wires that held together her body had suddenly gone taut.

Or maybe it wasn't adrenaline. Maybe it was anger, because by the time Sara walked into the hospital, she was so angry that she could barely function.

No—she wasn't just angry. She was furious.

Furious to be here. Furious that she wasn't home taking a shower or eating breakfast or walking the dogs or sleeping in her bed or going about her normal life. Furious that yet again, she'd become ensnared in another one of Lena Adams's deadly webs.

If the wires had gone taut, it was only because Lena had pulled them.

The rage had started its slow build in the Grady ER, the moment Sara hung up with Nell. Sara had heard it humming in the background, like a song she couldn't remember the words to. She'd called Will. She'd packed the spare clothes and toiletries she kept at the hospital. She'd made arrangements with the dog sitter, her department head, her students. She'd filled up her car with gas. She'd driven just above the speed limit as she made her way out of the city. Jared needed her. Darnell needed her. That was what kept Sara moving forward. They were the only two things that mattered. Sara had a duty to be there for them. She owed it to Jeffrey. She owed it to Jared and Nell.

But by the halfway mark to Macon, the song got louder, and Sara's brain started adding words to the melody.

Jeffrey. Lena's partner. Sara's husband.

Sara's life.

She had held him in her arms as he lay dying. She had stroked her fingers through his thick hair one last time. She had touched the rough skin of his cheek one last time. She had pressed her lips to his, felt his ragged last breaths in her mouth. She had begged him not to leave even as she watched the life slowly leave his beautiful eyes.

Sara had wanted to follow him. Grief set her adrift, unmoored her from everything that mattered. Weeks went by, months, but the pain was a relentless tide that would not ebb. Finally, Sara had taken too many pills. She'd told her mother it was a mistake, but Sara hadn't made a mistake. She'd wanted to die, and when she found that she could not die, the only thing she could do was start over.

She'd left her family, her home, her life, and moved to Atlanta. She had bought an apartment that was nothing like the house she'd shared with Jeffrey. She'd purchased furniture that Jeffrey would not have liked, dressed in clothes he would never expect her to wear. Sara had even taken a job Jeffrey had never seen her do. She'd made her life into something that worked without him.

And she'd met Will.

Will.

The thought of his name smoothed down some of the sharp edges. Sara wanted so badly to be with him right now that she almost turned around. She saw herself getting into her car, heading toward the highway, retracing her steps back to Atlanta.

There was a clingy red dress hanging in Sara's closet. She would wear it with the painfully high heels that made Will lick his lips every time he saw them. Sara would brush out her hair, wear it down around her shoulders the way he liked. She would darken her eyeliner, load up on the mascara. She would wear a touch of perfume everywhere she wanted him to kiss her. And as soon as he walked through the door, Sara would tell Will that she was deeply, irrevocably in love with him. She'd never said the words to him before. Never found the right time.

Time.

A sharp, startling memory jolted Sara out of her plans. She was at her old house standing in front of the fireplace. What was she wearing? Sara didn't have to think for long. She was in the same black dress she'd worn to her husband's funeral. Days had passed before her mother managed to get Sara to take off the dress, to shower, to change into something that didn't carry the stench of Jeffrey's death.

And still, Sara had kept returning to the fireplace. She could not stop staring at the cherrywood clock on the mantel. It was a beautiful old thing, a wedding gift to Sara's grandmother that had been passed to Sara, just like the watch she wore on her wrist. That Sara had inherited two timepieces was not something she'd ever considered remarkable. What she remembered most from the days after the funeral was watching the second hand move on her grandmother's clock, hearing the loud tick of the gears marking time.

Sara had stopped the clock. She had put her watch in a drawer. She had unplugged the clock beside her bed—their bed that she could no longer sleep in. She had found some electrician's tape in Jeffrey's workbench and covered the clock on the microwave, the stove, the cable box. It became an obsession. No one could enter the house with a watch. No one could remark on the passage of time. Anything that reminded Sara that life was moving on without Jeffrey had to be hidden from sight.

"Mrs. Tolliver?"

Sara felt another jolt. She'd stopped walking. She was standing stock-still in the middle of the hospital lobby as if lightning had struck.

"Mrs. Tolliver?" the man repeated. He was older, with a shock of white-gray hair and a well-trimmed mustache.

As with Nell's phone call, Sara's memory took a few seconds to cull information from her past. She finally said, "Chief Gray."

He smiled warmly at Sara, though there was a familiar reserve in his eyes. Sara thought of it as the Widow Look—not the look a widow gave, but the one she received. The one that said the viewer didn't quite know what to say because, secretly, all he or she could feel was so damn lucky it hadn't happened to them.

He held out his hand. "Lonnie."

"Sara." She shook his hand, which felt solid and reassuring, just like the man. Lonnie Gray was an old-school cop, the type who could never really leave the job. Even during retirement, he'd taken up consulting, moving around the state to help whip various law enforcement agencies into shape. Sara hadn't seen Gray since the funeral. Or at least she assumed that was the last time. Sara had been so heavily medicated during the service that the only memories she had were the ones her mother and sister had planted there.

She said, "I didn't know you were running Macon now."

"Consulting proved to be even more boring than it sounded. I missed being a benevolent dictator." Gray smiled at the joke, which they both recognized as the truth. Despite his grandfatherly appearance, Sara couldn't see Lonnie Gray offering advice that no one had to take.

She said, "Macon is lucky to have you."

"Well, let's just say I'm glad it hasn't been put to a vote." He glanced down at Sara's hand, probably to see whether or not she had remarried. "I hear you're living in Atlanta now?"

"Yes." Sara decided to acknowledge the obvious. "You and I keep meeting under bad circumstances."

"We do indeed." Gray seemed to appreciate her candidness. "Jared's stabilized for now. The doctors are taking good care of him."

Sara was relieved to be on more comfortable footing. "Do you mind if I ask why he wasn't taken to MCGG?" The Medical Center of Central Georgia was a Level 1 trauma center, much better equipped for a gunshot wound than Macon General.

Chief Gray deflected. "I'm sorry. I called you Mrs. Tolliver. You're a doctor, aren't you?"

"Yes." Sara could only guess why he'd sidestepped the question. The ambulance crew had obviously been thinking in seconds, not minutes. Jared's injuries had necessitated rushing him to the closest emergency room.

"Rest assured, we'll find out who did this to your stepson." Gray gave her a sage nod, as if to remind Sara that they always got their man. It was so maddeningly black and white to some people. They thought vengeance made it easier, when, in fact, all it did was fester the sorrow.

Gray continued, "Jeffrey's surely been missed these past few years. I could use his skills on this one."

Sara already knew the answer, but she asked, "You called in the state?"

"Never hurts to have extra hands."

He wasn't being diplomatic. Lonnie Gray was the same kind of chief that Jeffrey had been. They weren't concerned with glory. They just wanted the bad guys caught and the good guys to go home at night.

Sara said, "I'm sure you'll figure out why this happened."

"As am I, Dr. Tolliver. That's a promise." His voice took on a practiced tone that he probably employed whenever duty called. "Jared's a good kid. Wish I had fifty more of 'em. And Detective Adams has been a great addition to the team. We'll have them back up on their feet in no time. You know we take care of our people."

Sara tried to think of an appropriate response, but Lonnie Gray was obviously not expecting one. He looked as drained as Sara felt. She'd seen Jeffrey in the same circumstance many times. His shoulders were slumped from the burdens placed on him. His face was drawn. Policing was an occupation, but no one stayed in it long enough to become chief without feeling a true calling.

Sara followed Gray's gaze as he took in his officers. She tried not to catalogue the similarities from five years ago. The Band-Aids on their arms where they'd all given blood. The way boredom compelled them to chip off the edges of their Styrofoam coffee cups. The expectant looks in their eyes when anyone new appeared.

Lonnie Gray said, "My son passed away just recently."

Sara didn't know he'd had a son. "I'm sorry to hear that."

"Thank you." He sounded resigned. "I'm sure you know it never gets easy."

Sara nodded again. There was a lump in her throat that she could not swallow. "I should go."

"I'll walk you up."

"No," she said, almost interrupting him. "Thank you, I'm fine. Stay here with your men."

He seemed relieved. "The mother's up there. I take it there's no love lost between her and my detective. Perhaps you could ...?"

Despite the circumstances, Sara felt a smile come to her lips. He was talking to her the way he'd talk to any senior officer's wife. She imagined it was the same in the military, or any other male-dominated profession where the women were expected to keep hearth and home running smoothly while the men went out and conquered the world.

She said, "I'm not sure it's my place."

"Adams was your husband's partner."

"She was," Sara confirmed, though she gathered Gray didn't know about their complicated history. She paused before adding, "I really should go. Nell's waiting for me."

"Thank you." He grasped her hand between his. "And remember, if there's anything I can do for you, just ask."

Sara could only nod again, which was the response Chief Gray seemed to need. He touched her elbow before walking away. Sara watched him approach one of his detectives. The man's relaxed posture immediately took on a military stance. He nodded at Sara with a familiar, exaggerated deference she'd come to expect whenever any officer learned that she was a cop's widow.

Sara nodded back, thinking the sentiment was comforting until it became suffocating. She did not want to be tragic. She had fought the stigma for years at Grady, where a cop was generally posted outside every third room. Oddly, it wasn't until Sara had started dating Will that people had let her step down from the pedestal.

She didn't have it in her to climb back up again.

Sara followed the green stripe on the floor, knowing it would lead to the elevators, just as she knew the blue signage would direct her to the ICU. There was a reassuring sameness to private hospitals, with their bright lights and cheerful paintings that announced to the world that the majority of their patients were paying customers.

Sara pressed the button beside the elevator door. It was hard to believe that just a few hours ago, she'd done the same in Atlanta. As with the exterior, Grady's interior was different compared to Macon General. Everything here was clean and modern, befitting the clientele. Most of the hospital's money probably came from luxurious birthing suites, routine colonoscopies, and MRIs on baby boomers' knees. The paint was not chipped from the walls. Buckets were not strategically placed under leaking pipes. There was no permanent police precinct on site or a holding area for prison inmates and the criminally insane.

Frankly, Sara preferred Grady.

The elevator doors slid open with a tiny squeak. Sara got into the car. She was alone. The doors closed. She pressed the button by the blue sign. She watched the numbers flash on, then off, as the car traveled up to the fifth floor. With each burst of light, she suppressed the urge to speak the phrase that was playing over and over in her head: I don't want to be here. I don't want to be here. I don't want to be here.

Even before Jeffrey died, Sara had never liked Lena Adams. She was dangerous. Arrogant. Sloppy. Jeffrey constantly complained about Lena's headstrong ways, but Sara knew how her husband's mind worked. There was no sexual attraction between them—sometimes Sara wished it had been that simple. Lena was simply a challenge that Jeffrey could not walk away from. She was a destructive little sister to his all-forgiving big brother. Jeffrey loved her toughness. He loved her fight. He loved that no matter how hard Lena was hit, she always got back up after being knocked down.

And if Lena couldn't quite pick herself up, Jeffrey was always there to lend a hand. It was easy to take risks when you knew someone else would bear the consequences, which was exactly what had happened five years ago. Once again, Lena had gone off on her own, recklessly pursuing some very bad people. When they'd proven to be too dangerous for Lena to handle, she'd called Jeffrey to save her, just like she'd done countless times before. Only this time, this last time, the bad people hadn't backed down. This time, instead of making Lena pay, they had murdered Jeffrey.

Sara had no doubt that this same scenario had played out with Jared. Motorcycle cops didn't have hit squads break into their houses. Sara would've bet her life savings on Lena yet again pissing off some very bad men who'd decided just like the last bad men that the best way to punish Lena was to take away the thing she loved most.

As if Lena Adams was capable of loving anything.

The elevator doors slid open. Same crisp white. Same bright lights. Sara was on autopilot as she followed the arrows to the ICU waiting room. She walked by a tall man wearing a blue and orange baseball hat. He didn't recognize her, but Sara instantly knew Jerry Long, Darnell's husband and Jeffrey's boyhood friend. Everyone called him Possum because of a childhood accident involving illegal fireworks. He'd worshipped Jeffrey in that strange way that only straight men can. Possum had played wide receiver to Jeffrey's quarterback. He'd married Jeffrey's old girlfriend. He'd raised Jeffrey's child.

Sara kept walking. She kept her head down, passing unnoticed.

As a doctor, her life had been spent anticipating what would happen next, thinking three or four steps ahead, but for some reason, Sara's day was revealing itself in small slices. She hadn't let herself think past the mundane tasks in front of her: Leave Grady. Now drive down the interstate. Now take the exit. Now park the car. Now go into the hospital.

Seeing Possum offered a small glimpse of what was to come. They would want to reminisce about Jeffrey. They would want to tell old stories about pranks and practical jokes and loose women and angry husbands and Sara would have to sit there and listen to all of it as if her life had stopped the moment his had.

And it had stopped. Everything had come to a standstill. But, eventually, it had to start moving again, and Sara had built a new life for herself—a life that they would not understand.

The guilt felt like a vulture sitting on her shoulder, waiting for the right moment to devour her.

Sara could only put one foot in front of the other as she continued down the hall. She turned into the small waiting room just outside the closed double doors of the ICU. The space was empty but for an older woman whose hair was more gray than brown.

“Sara,” Nell said. She was sitting on a love seat underneath a window. A pile of knitting was in her lap. Several magazines were splayed beside her.

There was only a five-year difference between them, but Nell had aged in that way good country women do—no hair color, no makeup, no laser treatments to remove sunspots or smooth out wrinkles. She looked, in fact, entirely her age, which was not something Sara was used to seeing in Atlanta.

“Don’t get up,” Sara told her, leaning down to pull Nell into a tight hug. Nell had always been stout and strong, but there was something fragile about her now. Helplessness had reduced her.

Still, Sara said, “You haven’t changed a bit.”

Nell barked a laugh. “Hell, honey, don’t lie. We got mirrors in Alabama, too.” She moved the magazines so Sara could sit beside her. She took Sara’s hand, which was unusual. Nell wasn’t affectionate. She was talkative, and sometimes abrupt to the point of rudeness, but she was also incredibly kind—the sort of woman you could call in the middle of the night no matter how many years had passed and she would move heaven and earth to come to your side.

The sort of woman Sara should be.

She tightened her hold on Nell’s hand. “I’m so sorry this happened.”

“I shouldn’t’ve bothered you. I was just ...”

“I’m glad you did,” Sara told her, and in that moment, she really meant it. There was no way she could have stayed in Atlanta. This was where she belonged. “Is there anything I can do?”

Nell let out a heavy sigh. “I don’t know what you can do other than wait. They’re not telling me anything. Twenty-four hours, they say they might know more. What does that even mean?"

Sara knew that it meant they had no idea; it was all up to Jared now. Still, she told Nell, "It means he's young and he's strong and his body needs time to fight this."

"I hope you're right." Nell let go of Sara's hand. She tucked her knitting into a denim bag. "You were right about her, Sara. First Jeffrey and now this. That woman is nothin' but poison."

Sara felt a familiar tightening in her throat. "We should just concentrate on Jared right now."

Nell shook her head. "She won't leave the room. Just sits there in the corner like a damn gargoyle." Her lips turned into a thin white line. "I can't even stand to look at her. Takes everything I got not to spit in her face."

Sara forced back the impulse to agree. It would do no good for them to feed off each other. "Who's his doctor?"

"Shammers. Shaman. I can't remember. Something foreign."

"Is he with this hospital or did they call him over from Central Georgia?"

"No idea. He gave me his card." Nell picked up her purse to search for it. "I don't even know if this is a good hospital."

"It's good," Sara told her, though she hoped they'd called in the bigger guns from the trauma center. "How long has he been out of surgery?"

She looked at her watch. "About an hour."

"Did they give you any details?"

"Hell, Sara, I don't know that medical stuff. He was shot with a shotgun. The pellets went everywhere. His head, his neck, and back."

"Did any penetrate the skull?"

"They're monitoring his brain swelling. I guess that means it went into his brain." She turned to Sara. "They said they might have to release the pressure. Is that bad?"

Sara explained, "The skull has a fixed volume. If the brain swells, it needs somewhere to go."

"So they just saw off the top of his head?"

"Not like you're thinking. It's a very precise surgical procedure." She put her hand on Nell's shoulder. "Don't think about that until you have to, all right?" Nell reluctantly nodded. "What about his spinal cord?"

"You mean, will he be crippled?" She shrugged, a tight, jerky movement. "They're keeping him knocked out. Said it's best he sleeps, but I know my boy. He'd hate being pumped full of pain pills."

Sara knew that Nell couldn't fathom the amount of pain her son was in. "Did Jared say anything before they put him under?"

"Chief Gray told me he was unconscious when they brought him in. Do you know him?"

"Gray?" Sara nodded. "Jeffrey worked a case with him before we met. He trusted him. So does everyone else. Gray's worked all over the state, received all kinds of awards."

Nell wasn't impressed. "For whatever that's worth. Didn't stop Jared from getting shot." She started pulling things out of her purse. A hairbrush. Her pocket Bible. A tin of Burt's Bees lip balm. "Where did I put that damn card?"

Sara asked, "How has Jared been lately?"

"Healthy as a horse."

"No, not his health." Sara didn't know how to broach the subject, so she dove right in. "Has he been working a case he was worried about? Or has Lena been doing something?"

"Oh, he won't say a word against her—not Little Miss Perfect." Nell took out a blister pack of gum. She offered a piece to Sara.

Sara shook her head. "When's the last time you talked to him?"

"He calls me every Sunday and Wednesday after church. Mind you, he's not going himself. Stopped doing that once he met up with her."

Today was Thursday. Sara asked, "So, you talked to him last night?"

"Nine o'clock and he was at a bar with his friends. What does that tell you?" Nell wasn't looking for an answer. "Says something's not right, that's what it tells you. Wednesday night, he should be at home with his wife, not off somewhere drinking with his buddies."

Sara kept her opinion to herself. Jared was a grown man. Married or not, he was entitled to a night out. "Did he say anything on the phone that sounded off?"

"No. Just the usual. 'Work's good. Lena's great. Tell Daddy I said hey.' Nothing but puppies and sunshine." She snorted at the thought. "They didn't even get married in a church. Did it downtown like they were signing a contract. You've met her uncle?" Sara nodded again. "He was the only one there on her side. That tells you everything you need to know right there. No friends. Nobody from work. Just some old piece of beef jerky looks like he belongs on the side of the road harassing people for money.” She pointed to her bare arms. “Had needle tracks up and down his arms. Didn’t even bother hiding ’em. God knows if they’re old or new.”

Sara pressed her lips together, catching a glimpse of that bottomless pit she’d barely managed to pull herself out of. “Nell, it won’t do any good getting worked up like this.”

Nell was obviously reluctant to let go, but finally she said, “You’re right. If I keep talking about her, I’m gonna end up going in there and killing her.” Nell looked down at her purse again and concentrated on digging around for the doctor’s card. “He needs his pajamas. He’d hate waking up in one of those gowns.”

“We’ll get some pajamas for him,” Sara offered, knowing there was no point.

“I want to see the house. I’ve only seen pictures. What do you make of that? I’m less than four hours away, but she’s never invited me for Christmas or holidays or nothing.”

Sara wasn’t about to take up for Lena, but she doubted Nell had made things easy. “The forensic team is probably still there.”

“The forensic team.” Nell let the words settle. “I want to go by the house. I want to see where it happened.”

“That’s probably not a good idea,” Sara countered. “The police don’t clean up before they leave. It’ll look just how it did last night.”

Nell seemed shocked by the information. She recovered quickly, taking a small notebook and a pen out of her purse. “I’ll tell Possum to go by the dollar store. There’s one right off the exit.” She clicked the pen and started writing. “We’ll need a bunch of rags. Lysol spray. Trash bags. Some gloves. What else—bleach?”

Sara tried to reason with her. “There are services that take care of this kind of thing.”

“I’m not gonna let some stranger clean my baby’s house.” She sounded appalled. “That’s the most ridiculous thing I’ve ever heard.”

Sara knew better than to argue.

“Why would anyone do this?” Nell asked. “He’s always been the sweetest boy. Never said a hard word against anybody.

Always helping people. Never asking for anything in return. Why, Sara? Why would someone hurt him?"

Sara shook her head, though Lena's name was on the tip of her tongue.

"His eyes are taped shut. He's got all kinds of tubes coming out of him. They got this plastic thing looks like a Connect Four sticking out of his side."

"That's probably a Pleur-evac," Sara guessed. "It helps keep his lung open to give it time to heal."

"Well, you've just told me more than anybody else has, thank you very much."

Sara doubted this was true. She'd seen the glazed look in Nell's eyes before. In traumatic situations, it was hard to understand the information being conveyed by doctors, let alone ask salient questions.

Sara told Nell the same thing she told the families of her patients. "Write down all your questions as they come. If I can't answer them, then we'll find someone who will. All right?"

"That's good. I should've thought to do that. I've just been so ..." She couldn't finish the thought. "I mean, seeing him all—" Her words were cut off by a guttural sound. She lowered the notebook and pen to her lap, the shopping list forgotten. Tears rolled down her cheeks. Sara wondered if she was wishing her husband would return. More likely, she was praying her son would walk through the door.

Sara took Nell's hand again, but she couldn't look at her. The pain was too raw. While Sara witnessed the possibility of death almost every single day, knowing Nell, knowing Jared, made it different. She had lost her outsider's perspective.

"Well, this is useless." Nell's voice was filled with self-recrimination. "Crying never helped anybody." She pulled a pack of Kleenex from her purse and dried her eyes. "I haven't told Delia." Jared's sister, Nell's youngest child. "She's working in the Gulf. She's a vet now. Did you know that?" Sara nodded. "They got her scraping oil off sea turtles. She says the whole damn coast is still a tar pit."

"You need to tell her."

"What do I say? 'That bitch your brother married mighta got him killed?'" Nell shook her head, visibly angry. "I knew when I found out he was seeing her that nothing good would come of it."

Sara said nothing.

“He kept it from me for a full year. He knew I wouldn’t approve. He knew why, too.” Nell blew her nose in the Kleenex. “You warned me, Sara. You warned him, too. There’s no harm in a big fat ‘I told you so’ right about now.”

Sara didn’t respond. She got no joy from being right.

“Jared just wouldn’t listen. Kept saying Jeffrey knew the risk when he put on the badge. Like she had nothing to do with it. Like she didn’t abandon him when the going got tough.” Nell’s mouth twisted with disgust. “Part of me wonders if I’d just shut up about her, maybe he woulda gone on to somebody new.”

The arguments were so familiar that Sara could practically recite them along with Nell. She’d tortured herself with the same recriminations after Jeffrey had died. Sara should’ve stopped him from working with Lena. She should’ve put her foot down. She should’ve told him that it was too dangerous, too risky, to get involved in Lena’s life.

But his focus had always been on saving other people, never on saving himself.

Sara told Nell, “You can’t second-guess yourself.”

“Can’t I?” She indicated the waiting room. “I got all the time in the world to think about everything I’ve done wrong.”

Sara forced a change in subject. “I saw Possum in the hall.”

Nell slumped back against the couch. She didn’t speak for a few seconds. “He’s just a wreck. Keeps breaking down. I ain’t seen him cry like that in five years. Won’t listen to the doctors. Won’t go into Jared’s room. It’s not because of Lena. He always got along with her. You know how friendly he is. The man would talk to a stump about its knots. But all this stuff—” She waved her hand in the air, indicating the hospital. “It just brings it back for him. You, too, I guess.”

Sara looked past Nell at the floral painting on the wall. Unbidden, she thought about Will. Lying on the couch with him. Watching TV. His arms around her. Their dogs piled around them.

Nell said, “We all went to the hospital that night.” She didn’t have to say which night. “Drove straight through without stopping. Like there was any use him being at a hospital. Nothing could be done for him by then. Hell, if there was something to do, you woulda done it.”

Sara felt the image of Will slip away. The vulture was back with its guilt, digging its talons into her flesh.

Nell continued, "I know we lost touch with you for a reason. It's just too painful, isn't it? And here I dragged you back down into all of it. I'm sorry for that, Sara. I didn't know who else to call."

Sara nodded. All she could manage was, "Jeffrey would've wanted me here."

Nell said, "I wish to God I'd told him about Jared sooner. Given him a chance to know his son."

"He understood why you didn't," Sara said, thinking that was only half a lie. Jeffrey had been trying to find a way to connect with Jared before he died. It was a tricky proposition. Nell could be a hard woman, and Possum deserved better than to have some other man come in and try to be Jared's father.

Nell asked, "Do you remember the first time I met you?"

It felt like a hundred years ago, but Sara said, "Yes."

"You musta thought Jeffrey was crazy drivin' you down past where Jesus lost his sandals."

Sara smiled. Sylacauga, Alabama, was the very definition of rural, but she had been so pleased that Jeffrey wanted her to meet his family, his people. "We crashed your garden party."

"You told me you were a stripper."

Sara laughed. She'd forgotten that part. Nell had prompted the response, asking Sara whether she was a stewardess or a stripper. They'd all had this idea of Jeffrey in their heads—the sort of man he was, the type of woman he dated.

And they had been so wrong.

"Anyway," Nell said. "We're miserable enough without digging up the past. I know you still deal with it every single day." Again, she took Sara's hand in her own, but this time, she smoothed out the finger where Sara's wedding ring used to be. "I'm glad you took it off, darlin'. Someday when enough time's passed, you'll find a way to move on."

Sara nodded again, forcing herself not to look away.

Five years.

She had mourned her husband for five years. She had been alone for five years. She had waited and waited for the ache to go away for five long, lonely years.

"Sara?"

Sara realized she'd missed a question. "Yes?"

"I asked could you go check on him? I know it'll be hard with Lena in there, but maybe you can do some of your doctor talk and see if you can find out anything they're not saying?"

Sara couldn't think of a reason not to. It was why she was here, after all. To help Nell. To help Jared. To be her husband's proxy as his son lay in a hospital bed. Even Chief Lonnie Gray had assumed Sara would play her part.

So she did.

Sara stood from the couch and left the tiny waiting room. She was still dressed in her hospital scrubs. The nurses' eyes passed over Sara as she pushed open the doors to the ICU and walked down the hall. The board behind the desk gave Jared's room number, but Sara would've known where he was by the cop stationed outside. The officer was standing a few yards down from the nurses' station, arm resting on his holster. There was a glass wall separating Jared's room from the hall. The curtain was half-closed. The door was open.

The cop gave Sara a nod. "Ma'am."

She didn't respond, just stood in the doorway to the room, acting as if she belonged.

The overhead lights were off. The machines provided a soft glow to see by. Jared's face was swollen. His body was still. Sara did not need to see his chart. The equipment in the room told the story. Pleur-evac connected to wall suction for the pneumothorax. Ventilator to assist breathing. Three IV pumps pushing fluids and antibiotics. NG tube to wall suction to keep the stomach empty. Pulse ox monitor. Blood-pressure monitor. Heart monitor. Urinary catheter. Surgical drains. A crash cart was pushed against the wall, the defibrillator on standby.

They weren't expecting Jared to rally anytime soon.

With great resignation, Sara forced herself to look at the corner opposite the bed.

Lena was sleeping. Or at least her eyes were closed. She was balled up in a large chair. Her arms were wrapped around her legs, knees hugged to her chest. She was wearing hospital scrubs, probably because her clothes had been booked into evidence.

She seemed much the same. A yellowing bruise arched underneath her left eye. The bridge of her nose had a linear cut that had started to scab. Neither was unexpected. Sara could not think of a time when Lena didn't have some visible bruise or mark that came from living her life so hard. The only thing different was her hair. It was longer than the last time Sara had seen her. At the funeral? Sara couldn't remember. No one in the Linton family could bear to utter the woman's name.

Sara took a deep breath, then walked into the room.

In many ways, seeing Jared was much harder than seeing Lena. He looked so much like Jeffrey—the dark hair, the tone of his skin, the delicate eyelashes. He was built like his father. He walked with the same athletic grace. Jared even had the same deep voice.

Sara put her hand to his face. She couldn't stop herself. She stroked her thumb along his forehead, traced the arc of his eyebrow. His hair was thick and surprisingly soft, like Jeffrey's had been. Even the scruff of his beard felt familiar, was growing back in the same pattern as Jeffrey's.

Lena still hadn't moved, but Sara could tell she was awake now—watching.

Slowly, Sara took her hand away from Jared's face. She would not let herself feel ashamed for touching him, for thinking the obvious thoughts, making the obvious connections.

Lena shifted in the chair. She unfolded herself, rested her feet on the floor.

Sara held Jared's hand. The palm was calloused. Jeffrey's hands had always felt smooth. His nails had been trimmed, not bitten to the quick. His cuticles weren't torn at the edges. Sometimes, Sara had caught him using the oatmeal-scented lotion she'd kept on the table by their bed.

Lena stood up from the chair.

Sara's heart hammered in her chest. She didn't know why. Just being in the same room with Lena made her feel nervous. Even with the cop outside. Even knowing that there was no way Lena could harm her, Sara felt unsafe.

And Lena, as usual, was oblivious. She stood by the bed. She didn't touch Jared. Didn't reach down to ease him or to reassure herself that he was still there. Instead of holding him, she held herself. Her arms were wrapped around her waist. She had always been so goddamn self-contained.

"Sara—" Lena breathed. It was more like a sob. Lena had never been ashamed to cry. She used it to great effect. She hissed in a mouthful of air, her body shaking from the effort. Her hand gripped the railing on the bed. Her wedding ring was yellow gold with a small diamond. Blood was caked into the setting. She was waiting for Sara to say something, to make it all better.

Automatically, the words came to Sara's mind, the advice she had given over countless hospital beds: It's okay to touch him. Hold his hand. Talk to him. Kiss him. Ignore all the tubes coming out of his body and lie beside him. Let him know on some basic level that he is not alone. That you are here to help him fight his way back.

Sara said none of this. Instead, she chewed at the tip of her tongue until she tasted blood. Her heart was still pounding. The fear was gone. A coldness had taken over. Sara could feel it moving through her body, its icy fingers wrapping around her torso, scratching at her throat.

"I can't—" Lena's voice caught. For Sara, it was like listening to herself five years ago. Just with those two words, she felt it all over again. The devastation. The loss. The loneliness.

"I can't—" Lena repeated. "I can't do it. I can't live without him."

Sara gently pulled her hand away from Jared's. She smoothed down the sheet, tucked it in close around his side. She looked at Lena—really looked at her straight in the eye.

"Good," Sara told her. "Now you know how it feels."

6.

Will rode his motorcycle around the Macon General parking lot until he spotted Sara's BMW. It was a stupid thing to do, but he was feeling pretty stupid lately anyway. She'd bypassed the doctors' lot and found a spot in the back under a stand of shade trees. He suppressed the desire to get off his bike and touch the hood of her car. Will told himself it was only to see how long she'd been there, but deep down he knew he wanted some kind of connection.

Which was embarrassing and pathetic enough to make him gun the engine and proceed to the employee lot at an inadvisable speed.

Fortunately, burning some rubber in the parking lot was exactly the kind of thing his alter ego would do. Will had gone undercover before. He liked to think that he was pretty good at getting into character. There were some happily retired chickens in North Georgia who could attest to his skills. While busting a cockfighting ring was not as dangerous as his current assignment, the GBI's information officers had managed to give Will an even more impressive cover this time around.

As with the day laborers outside the Home Depot, Will imagined that Bill Black, his cover ID, provided a glimpse into what could have been. The man was a con, the sort of guy who knew his way around the system. He had a sealed juvie record and a dishonorable discharge from the Air Force. More important, there were three serious charges on his adult sheet—two for knocking around various women and another for pushing a mall cop down an escalator.

The latter charge had landed Bill Black in the Fulton County jail for ninety days. He'd been paroled for good behavior, but was kept on a tight leash by a parole officer who reported directly back to Amanda. The PO had already dropped by the hospital a few times for surprise check-ins. Bill Black was a scary guy. There were other crimes that the cops were looking at him for. A gas station stickup. Some messy business up in Kentucky. An assault that left a man blind in one eye. Black was what those in the know called a person of interest.

The GBI had managed to locate a couple of snitches who were willing to back up Black's cover story in exchange for leniency. Another con told Will all the gossip floating around the jail during the time in which Bill Black was incarcerated. The guards had confirmed the lurid details, which sounded like a mash-up of Cool Hand Luke and The Sopranos. Then they had taken some unflattering photos of Will holding up a placard with Black's name and inmate number. Aside from the lack of any pathetic jailhouse tattoos, Will would've been hard-pressed to find the holes in his backstory.

Of course, there were always holes to be found, but Will wasn't about to share the biggest one with Amanda: the name Bill Black, which Amanda had proudly presented to Will as if on a silver platter, made his brain feel like it belonged in a Salvador Dalí painting.

"Bill rhymes with Will," she'd told him, handing over the dossier he was required to memorize. "And of course Black is a color."

Will gathered from her demeanor that he was supposed to be grateful. The truth was, she might as well have thrown on a leotard and acted out the name in interpretive dance.

Will was dyslexic, a fact that Amanda only trotted out when she couldn't find a sharper knife in her drawer. He wasn't about to have an open conversation about his problem—that was what the Internet was for—but if Amanda had bothered to look it up, she would've realized dyslexia wasn't a reading disorder, but a language-processing disorder. Which was why Will had no ear for rhymes and couldn't understand how Black could be a color when the capital letter meant that it was a name.

But Will had sat in Amanda's office and thumbed through Bill Black's file like it made perfect sense.

"Looks good," he'd told her.

She hadn't been convinced. "You want me to help you with the big words?"

Will had closed the file and left her office.

He could read—he wasn't a complete imbecile—but it took some time and a lot of patience. Over the years, Will had learned a few tricks to help him pass as more fluent. Holding a ruler under a line of text to keep the letters from jumping around. Using the computer to dictate his reports or read his emails. He'd been told in school that he read on a second-grade level. Not that his teachers had formally diagnosed him with anything other than stupidity. Will was in college when he finally learned that what he had was called dyslexia, but it was too late by then for him to do anything but pray to God that no one found out.

For the most part, not many people did. Amanda seemed happy to keep it as a weapon in her arsenal. Faith had discovered it during their first case, and whenever anything involving reading came up, she took on a maternal tone that made Will want to stick his head in a wood chipper.

And of course Sara knew. She'd figured it out immediately. Will guessed being a doctor helped her recognize the signs. The weird part was that she treated him no different from before. She saw his dyslexia as just another part of Will, like the color of his hair or the size of his feet.

She saw him as normal.

And if he kept revving his motorcycle, she'd look out the window and see him riding through the parking lot.

The irony was not lost on Will that he'd spent the last ten days hiding the truth from Sara only to find himself stuck not just in the same city, but in the same building dealing with basically the same people. He would do anything to have her back in Atlanta, where the lies flowed a lot easier. In Macon, there was the constant possibility that Will would turn a corner or open a door and find Sara standing there wanting answers.

He coasted the Triumph into his usual spot by the employee entrance. The rain had accompanied him most of the trip down from Atlanta, spitting fine needles into his face. Will's helmet wasn't the wraparound kind, but a shorty, which gave his head the minimum coverage allowed by law. It was closer to a beanie. Every time a large truck crowded him on the interstate, Will wondered if he'd actually be able to see his brains on the asphalt before he died or if death would be instantaneous.

The thought was not a new one. Will had ridden a Kawasaki in his twenties because the bike was cheap and gas was expensive. And it had to be said that the sensation of sitting atop a large, vibrating machine was not an unpleasant feeling for a young man with limited dating experience. Add another decade, and the story took a considerably darker tone. His back ached. His hands hurt. His shoulders were screaming. Other areas were equally displeased. Will shook out his legs as he got off the bike. He unbuckled his helmet and peeled it off his head.

“Hey, Bud,” a nurse called.

Will looked up. The woman was leaning against the building and sucking on a cigarette. He’d told people to call him Buddy because he didn’t want to recall his conversation with Amanda every time he heard Bill Black’s name. That his hospital colleagues had all shortened it to Bud was an unforeseen development.

She asked, “Good ride?”

Will grunted, which was a typical Bill Black response.

“That’s nice.” She smiled at him. Her bleach-blond hair didn’t move in the breeze. Her tight pink scrubs were covered in leaping dolphins. “You hear about what happened last night with them two cops?”

“Yep.” Will pulled the bandanna off his head and used it to wipe the road from his face.

“One of ’em’s in the ICU. Might not wake up.” She picked something off the tip of her tongue. “Po-po’s crawling all over the place.”

Will grunted again. He stuck the bandanna in his back pocket.

She exhaled a long stream of smoke. “Tony says they were at his house this morning. Fools stole his car and used it for the hit. You believe that?”

Will stared at her, trying to decipher whether or not she was being rhetorical. He decided his best bet was to ignore the question altogether. “I need to clock in.”

He tucked his helmet under his arm as he walked toward the door. The nurse took a last hit off the cigarette. She didn’t seem to mind his gruffness. This was typical of the women in Bill Black’s social circle. They expected their men to be quiet, to grunt and glare and scratch and spit. For Will, who’d been trained to put the toilet seat back down before he was even out of diapers, it was like living on the moon.

Or utopia, depending on how you looked at it.

“Take care now,” the nurse said. She winked at Will as he opened the door. He didn’t bother to hold it open for her. He knew the woman's type, had seen her standing in the periphery his entire life. They were at the children's home. They were out in the streets. Oftentimes, they were in the back of a squad car. They chose the wrong guys, made all the wrong decisions. The worse you treated them, the tighter they held on.

Will had always known this type of woman found him attractive. Maybe it was the scars on his face. Maybe it was some invisible mark left by his childhood that only fellow travelers could see. Either way, they were drawn to Will because they thought he was damaged or dangerous or both. He had spent his life avoiding them. The only way to hold the interest of a desperate woman was to be a certain type of man. Will had never wanted to be that man.

"Hey," the nurse called. She stood in the open doorway, hand on her hip. "It's Cayla, by the way."

Will stared at her. He was standing outside the employee locker room. She was thirty feet away. The gray dolphins on her shirt looked like spoiled sperm.

She gave a flirty smile. "Cayla with a C."

Will didn't think another grunt would travel. He tried to be clever. "You want me to write that down or something?"

"Sure do." She laughed in a way that made him feel small. "Whatchu doin' after work?"

He shrugged.

"Why don't you come by my house for supper? I bet you ain't had nothin' home-cooked since you got out."

Bill Black's history had gotten around fast. Will had worked at the hospital less than two weeks and she already knew he'd been in jail.

She pressed, "How about it? Around seven? I can get a good scald on a chicken."

Will hesitated. He knew Cayla Martin's name from her rap sheet, which showed an arrest for drunken driving four years ago. DUIs came with expensive fines. Cayla still had another thousand dollars to pay before she was allowed to do more than drive herself to and from work. She was also a pharmacy nurse, which meant she had access to all the pills that kept getting stolen.

Cayla stamped her foot. "Come on, Bud. Let me cook you somethin' good."

Will was contemplating his options when Tony Dell came out of the locker room. The man panicked. His sneakers squeaked against the floor as he tripped over his feet trying to flee.

Con or cop—it didn't matter. When someone was trying to get away from you, you stopped them. Will dropped his helmet on the floor. He grabbed Tony by the back of the neck and slammed him face-first into the door.

"Hey!" Tony cried. He was a little guy. Will was almost a foot and a half taller and carried at least fifty pounds more muscle. Lifting Tony off his feet was as easy as lifting Sara.

Will made his voice a growl. "What the fuck did you get me into?"

"I didn't—" Tony tried. Obviously, it was difficult for him to talk with his face smashed against a door. "Come on, Bud! I was tryin' to hook you up!"

"I'll hook you to a fucking noose."

"Bud! I'm serious, dude. I didn't know!" His toes kicked at the door as he tried to find purchase. "Come on!"

Will let him go. Tony's feet slid back to the floor. He took a few seconds to collect himself. He was breathing hard. Sweat poured from his brow, but whether that was because he was high or terrified, Will wasn't sure. Regardless, now that Tony wasn't afraid of having his neck snapped, he took umbrage with the rough treatment. "Jesus, dude. What's wrong with you?"

Will demanded, "Who set up the job?"

Tony looked up and down the hallway to make sure they were alone. Cayla had vanished. Women like that knew when to get out of the way.

"Damn." Tony rubbed the back of his neck. "That hurt, man."

"Who set it up?" Will jammed his finger into Tony's shoulder. "Tell me, you little shit."

Tony slapped his hand to his shoulder. "I don't know. Two guys at the bar came up and asked did I wanna make some money."

"Last night?"

"Yeah, after work."

"You knew them?"

"I seen 'em around." He started rubbing his shoulder. "You seen 'em, too. Them guys who hang back in the special corner."

The VIP section of Tipsie's. Will had seen it all right. It was about as welcoming as the shower room at the state pen. "How much money did they offer?"

Tony turned shift.

Will put his hand on Tony's chest and pushed him back against the door. There was no force behind the hold, but the threat was enough to get the little man talking.

"Fifteen hundred bucks."

Will pulled back his fist. "You mother—"

"They told me we'd be safe!" Tony yelled, his hands going up. "They said we just needed to stand out in the street like we did. Nothin' to it."

Will kept his fist at the ready. "So you get a thou and I get five bills?"

"I was closest to the house." He gave a halfhearted shrug. "My spot was more dangerous."

Will let his fist drop. "You knew it was more than a robbery."

Tony opened his mouth, then closed it. He checked again to make sure they were alone. "I ain't gonna lie to you, Bud. I knew there was some people in the house might get hurt. I swear on a stack of Bibles I had no idea they was cops. No way I woulda taken that job, let alone bring you into it. We's friends, right?"

"My friends don't throw me in the shit when I'm already on parole." Will's shirt had pulled out from his jeans. He tucked it back in as he looked up and down the hall. "This better not blow back on me."

Tony wasn't as stupid as he looked. "Why'd you wanna go in the house so bad anyway? What was up with that?"

The million-dollar question. Will had figured out his answer on the ride down. "I need the money. Dead men don't pay."

"I hear ya," Tony said, but he was obviously not buying it. "You sure did run in there like a bat outta hell, though. Near about took my head off. I was only trying to help you."

Again, Will checked the hallway. "I got an ex, all right? Girl up in Tennessee. She's got a kid by me. I didn't believe her, but the test came back." Will tried to put some anger in his voice. "Bitch said she'd file on me if I don't throw down five K before the baby comes." He said the phrase he'd heard from many a con. "I can't go back to jail again, man. I can't do it."

Tony nodded his understanding. Will had gathered from various conversations at Tipsie's that the DNA tests they feared most were the ones that proved paternity. What was harder to believe was that the slang Will had picked up from watching an outlaw biker show on cable was actually working.

"I hear ya, man." Tony scratched his arm, a nervous habit that had left permanent red streaks on his skin. "You want, I could run up there with you, give her a talkin'-to."

"You wanna keep your voice down?" Will asked. "Every pig in the county's upstairs. That cop might not make it. You wanna guess what happens then?"

Tony kept scratching his arm. "So, what'd you see?" Again, he checked the hall. "Inside the house. What'd you see?"

"One dead guy, one on his way out." Will tried to fight back the bloody image of Lena straddling Fred Zachary, preparing to break his spine in two. "Some crazy chick with a hammer."

"She see you?"

"You think she'd be alive if she did?"

Tony lowered his voice. "I heard she used the claw."

"You know her?" Will clarified, "The cop. She ever bang you up?"

"Shit no. Ain't no bitch takin' me down, bro."

Will guessed an eight-pound Chihuahua could take down Tony Dell. "Why'd they wanna kill two cops? They on the take?"

"Dudes didn't say and I didn't ask." Tony backed himself against the door rather than let Will put him there. "Honest, Bud. I got no idea."

Will considered what a guy like Bill Black would be worried about in this situation. He asked, "What'd you do with the van?"

Tony was obviously not expecting the question. "It's cool. I know some guys."

"Whatever they paid you, half of it's mine."

Tony tried, "I didn't get much."

"Bullshit." Will grabbed Tony's arm to make sure the man was paying attention. "I'm only gonna ask you this one more time: Who do they work for?"

"I got no idea, dude. Honest."

"Well, you better think hard about it, because you and me are looking a hell of a lot like a couple of loose ends right now."

"You think they'll come after us?"

"You think whoever set this in motion is just gonna trust you not to talk?"

"Holy Christ." The color drained from Tony's face. "It's gotta be Big Whitey. He's the only dude I can think of who has them kind of balls.”

Will tightened his grip around Tony’s arm. It was a hell of a lot easier to interrogate someone when you could scare the crap out of them. “Why do you say that?”

“Because he’s killed cops before. Everybody knows that. Hell, man, I heard he took out a federal agent down in Florida.”

Yet another murder to look into. Will asked, “You sure you didn’t tell them my name?”

“Hell no, brother. Hell no.”

“If I find out you did ...”

“I promise!” Tony’s voice went up a few octaves. “Lookit, man. I ain’t no snitch. I’m tellin’ you straight up.” He used his free hand to dig into his back pocket. “Look, all right?” He pulled out a wad of cash. “This is all I got for the van. You take it, all right? We’ll call it even. Okay?”

Will took the cash. It was moist, which he tried not to think about as he counted out the bills. “Six hundred bucks. That’s all you got?”

“That’s more than you thought you’d get last night.”

Will grunted. Bill Black would be satisfied with the amount. “Lookit.” Tony scratched his arm again. “Big Whitey’s a businessman. We can go talk to him. Try to reason with him.”

“There’s no way I’m—”

“Just listen to me, hoss.” Tony kept scratching, even though he’d drawn blood on his arm. “I told you I got a pill thing going here. You and me could double it up and—”

“No,” Will said. “My PO got me this job. Who do you think they’re gonna look at when a ton of pills start going missing?” He loomed over Tony again. “What’d you say to the police when they rang your doorbell this morning?”

The furtive look was back. “How’d you hear about that?”

“That nurse. She’s probably told the whole damn hospital by now.”

“Cayla,” Tony provided. The soft way he said her name rang a bell. Cayla Martin was the girl Tony wouldn’t shut up about on the drive to Lena’s last night. It made sense that a pill freak would want to hook up with a pharmacy nurse.

Tony asked, “She say anything else about me?”

“No.”

“Are you sure?”

Will was getting tired of this. "She offered to cook me supper."

Tony took the news harder than Will anticipated. He tucked his chin down to his chest. "Are you gonna go?"

"Tell me what you said to the cops this morning."

Tony didn't answer. "I thought you were my friend, Bud. I can't believe you're going out with her."

Will couldn't believe he was having this conversation. "What'd you tell the cops, Tony? Don't make me beat it out of you."

He still sulked, but answered, "That the car musta been stolen. They asked me to come down to the station and file a report."

"You stay out of that station," Will warned. "They get you in there, you won't ever come out."

"I ain't tellin' 'em nothin'."

"You think that matters? Two cops were almost killed. They're gonna pin this on the first idiot they can find."

"They got the idiots," Tony said. "Them two guys from last night—one's dead. The other one can't even move, and they's no way in hell he'll open his mouth. I keep tellin' you—Big Whitey, he's got reach. He'll take 'em out in the hospital. In the jail. In the prison. Ain't nowhere Big Whitey can't get to you. Trust me, man. He's a bad dude."

Will gritted his teeth. Every conversation he'd ever had with Tony Dell tended to turn down Big Whitey Way at some point. Something about that didn't feel right, and Will's instinct was to shut it down. "Whatever, man. Just keep me out of it."

Tony sensed he was losing his audience. "We could talk to him. Let him know we ain't gonna rat. Maybe get on the payroll."

"No." Will picked up his helmet off the floor. He wiped the scuffs with the back of his sleeve. He tried more biker talk. "I gotta kid to pay for, my PO's up my ass. I don't need to be looking for more trouble."

"It don't gotta be like that."

"Whatever, bro. Just keep my name out of it."

Will yanked open the door to the locker room. The space was empty. Blue lockers ran down the walls and divided the room into three sections. He waited a few seconds, wondering if Tony Dell would follow. When the door stayed closed, Will headed toward the lockers on the back wall.

Bill Black's name was written on a piece of masking tape stuck to his locker. Will had used a Sharpie to cross it out and write

BUD. Three letters. It wasn't pretty—Will's handwriting had never been stellar—but it beat the locker next to his, where someone had drawn an ejaculating penis that had only one ball.

Will assumed it was an inside joke.

To secure his locker, Will had bought a luggage lock instead of a combination dial. Left and right had never been easy, but Will was good with numbers. He spun the four digits to the date he'd first kissed Sara. Or, technically, the date Sara had kissed him. The lock didn't need to know the details.

Will hung his helmet inside the locker and took out his folded work shirt and pants. Maintenance duty wasn't a bad job as these things went. Will was good at fixing things. The forms they made him fill out were designed for someone with little grasp of the English language. There were only five boxes to check or not check, and only one long line with an X beside it, which made it easy when it came time to sign his name. Not that Will signed his name. He wrote two capital letter Bs and left it at that.

Will took off his street clothes and dressed for work. He wore Bill Black's photo ID on a lanyard around his neck. A security card and set of keys were attached to a retractable wire on his belt. A flashlight hooked through a metal loop on the side. Will transferred the still-moist cash from Tony Dell into the front pocket of his work pants, hoping the bills would be dry when he logged them into evidence later. In a blue Velcro wallet were a few of Black's credit cards, a copy of a speeding ticket that served as his license, and some receipts that indicated Mr. Black preferred to do all his shopping at the RaceTrac near the mouth of the Ocmulgee Trail.

He checked the battery on his iPhone. Will didn't use a smartphone in his real life, but Bill Black was a little more sophisticated. Not that the device was the sort of thing you had to be a rocket scientist to operate. Will had figured out most of the programs on his own as he whiled away the hours at the fleabag efficiency motel where Bill Black rented a room by the week.

Black's primary email account was on the hospital server. The secondary account was through Gmail. The inbox contained some increasingly nasty messages that appeared to have been written by an angry pregnant woman in Tennessee. There were a few mildly racist forwards from some dummy accounts, but Bill Black didn't have many friends. The bulk of his mail consisted of junk sent from mailing lists that advertised hunting gear and naked women, and coupons for things like beef jerky and Old Spice.

Black's musical tastes ran toward country, with some Otis Redding thrown in as a hat tip to the singer's hometown of Macon. There were some pictures of scenic views taken from the highway. Black was a hunter, so it made sense that he would appreciate woods and trees. Black also liked the ladies. There were several risqué photos downloaded from the Internet. Blondes and Asians mostly. Will had briefly considered putting a few redheads on there, but that felt weird because of Sara. And also because of Sara, he knew they weren't really redheads.

The tech specialist at the GBI had done the rest of the heavy lifting, adding some stealth features to the phone. The apps ran in the background and were invisible to anyone who didn't know exactly what to look for. One of them automatically erased all phone numbers and texts going in and out. Another turned the speakers into a recording device when you tapped the power button three times. Yet another provided a rolling phone number in case Will had to make a call and didn't want his location to come up. The most important app patched the device into the military's tracking system—not the GPS available to the entire world, but the real-time global positioning used for things like targeting drones and delivering bombs.

This last app was the reason Will kept checking the battery. Amanda was right about many things, but none more than the belief that there was a link between Will's investigation into Big Whitey and the attack on Lena Adams and Jared Long. Even Tony Dell had made the connection.

Will didn't want to go off the grid because he forgot to plug in his phone.

The door banged open. Will turned around. He was half expecting to find Tony Dell, but the new guy was beefy looking with a full head of hair and a jaw that was sharp enough to cut glass.

Will knew a cop when he saw one. He did exactly what Bill Black would do—slammed his locker closed and headed toward the exit.

The cop held up his badge. "Detective Paul Vickery, Macon PD."

Lena's partner. That made sense. Will still didn't acknowledge him. He kept his beeline toward the door.

Vickery grabbed Will's shoulder and spun him around. He was a few inches shorter than Will, but he had a badge and a gun and obviously felt that gave him the right to be an asshole. "Where you going?" He glanced at the name stitched on Will's shirt. "Buddy."

Will tried to calm things down. "I don't want any trouble, all right?"

Vickery bounced on the balls of his feet, obviously spoiling for a fight. "Well, you're about to get it, motherfucker. Where's Tony Dell?"

Will shrugged, thinking Lena's partner didn't need to be face-to-face with the guy whose car was left outside the house where Jared Long was almost murdered. And Lena, too, for that matter. "I dunno, man. Ask at the front office."

"I'm asking you, fuckball. You're Bill Black, right?" Vickery wasn't looking for an answer. His eyes scanned the hospital ID hanging around Will's neck. "Your boss says you and Dell are real tight. Thick as thieves."

Will imagined Ray Salemi would've said anything to get Paul Vickery out of his office. "It's not exclusive," Will said. "We've both agreed to see other people."

"Funny, asshole." Vickery moved closer. "Where were you last night? You with Dell when him and his crew tried to take on my partner?"

Will had already arranged his alibi. "Ask my parole officer. He dropped in on me around midnight."

"I'm gonna do that." Vickery's beady eyes narrowed even more. "Something ain't right with you, asshole. I can feel it in my gut."

Will avoided the obvious joke.

"You're chest-high in this shit. I can smell it on you." Vickery sniffed, as if to illustrate the point. "Dell's a professional snitch. Just a matter of time before he rats you out. Why don't you beat him to it? Tell me what happened last night and I'll keep you outta jail."

"Sorry I can't help, Officer." Again, Will tried to leave, but Vickery's hand went to his chest, stopping him.

Vickery warned, "You got one more chance to tell me where your boyfriend is or I start taking it out on you."

"I said I don't—"

Vickery punched him in the face. Will saw it coming, but there wasn't enough time to get out of the way. Will's head swiveled. His jaw popped. He tasted blood in his mouth. Automatically, Will's fists went up.

He had to force them back down. Vickery was Lena's partner. Will didn't have to think long to consider the number of stupid things he'd do if someone threatened Faith and her family.

"Come on, Buddy." Vickery slapped Will's face with his open palm. "You wanna hit me, Buddy?" He whistled like he was calling a dog. "Come on, boy. Come on."

Will peeled his fingers from his palms to get them to unclench. Instead of beating the ever-loving shit out of Paul Vickery, he said, "You know there's a security camera in here, right?"

Vickery's eyes flicked upward to the corner. The camera was pointed straight down, its red light flashing. He seemed to be considering whether or not beating Will to death was worth losing his badge over.

Apparently not.

Vickery told Will, "This isn't over." He kicked the door open and stormed out with his hands fisted at his sides.

Will glanced up at the camera, which ran on a nine-volt battery and wasn't connected to anything because the Supreme Court had ruled that employees had an expectation of privacy when they were in a locker room.

You'd think a detective would know that.

Will checked his reflection in the mirror over the sink. Vickery hadn't done any visible damage. Will used his tongue to find the source of blood in his mouth. The inside of his cheek had cut against his teeth. He turned on the faucet and sipped some water. The wound started to sting. Will swished the water around until his spit was only slightly pink.

His phone buzzed in his pocket. He used the earbud to listen to the email from Ray Salemi, his helpful boss. Will read the words along with the tinny computer voice. He gathered Faith had found a way to get him and Lena in the same room together.

There was a leaking pipe in the ICU. Will had been assigned to fix it.

Will took the north stairwell up to the fifth floor. The going wasn't easy. His toolbox got heavier with each step. His body kept reminding him that he'd only gotten a few hours of sleep the night before. Will normally tried to run a few miles every day, but Bill Black's life didn't allow for such luxuries. By the third-floor landing, Will's arm was shaking. Level four brought shooting pains into his lower back. He set the toolbox down and used his bandanna to wipe the sweat off his face.

"Hey."

He looked up. Faith was leaning over the railing.

She looked down the open stairwell, making sure they were alone before asking, "Did you come up from the basement?"

He grabbed his toolbox and started climbing again. "The elevator opens up across from the waiting room, which is by the other set of stairs."

"Why didn't you take the elevator to the fourth floor and go up from there?"

Will watched a drop of sweat roll down his nose and splash onto the concrete steps.

"Will?"

He rounded the landing. Faith had that smile on her face that said she realized he was stupid but was being kind enough not to verbalize the observation. "I've been checking all the doors for the last fifteen minutes."

He asked, "Did you break a pipe or just pretend it's broken?"

"Water pistol. You'll see." She nodded toward the next flight of stairs. "Think you can make it?"

Faith took the steps two at a time. She had changed into her regs—black sneakers, tan cargo pants, and a long-sleeved blue polo shirt with the letters GBI written in bright yellow across the back. Her blonde hair was tucked into a matching blue ballcap with the same logo. Her Glock was strapped to her thigh.

Will dropped his toolbox by the door to the ICU. He looked through the skinny window into the ward. One nurse was behind the desk. The cop who was guarding Jared Long's room was so young he looked as if he was wrapped in plastic. Will had investigated cop shootings before. If Macon was like any other force on the planet, all the seasoned cops were out banging down doors and threatening sources.

Will headed up the stairs after Faith. The climb was remarkably easy without the added weight.

He pushed open the metal door. His eyes watered from the sudden sunlight. The rain clouds had receded, opening up a bright blue sky. Will gathered from the discarded cigarette butts in the pea gravel that the staff was familiar with the roof exit. He scanned the medical complex. The five-story hospital building was at the center. Two lower buildings flanked each side. Doctors rented the spaces. From what Will gathered, there were lots of baby doctors on hand. He'd been to the birthing suites a few times. They were more like hotel rooms. Most of Macon's industrial parks and factories had shut down during the recession, but Maconites were still making babies.

"Over here," Faith called.

There was a shed covering the exit door. Faith had walked around the back so no one could surprise them.

Will asked, "Sara?"

"She went shopping with Nell. Jared's mother. She wants to clean the house."

"The crime scene house?"

"That's the one."

Will felt his brow furrow. He couldn't imagine Sara thought that was a good idea.

Faith said, "I'll head over to the house later to make sure she's all right." She squinted at the name on his shirt. "Buddy?"

"It belonged to the last guy," Will lied. "I talked to Tony Dell this morning."

"And?"

"It's like we thought. Zachary and Lawrence found him at Tipsie's, said they needed a couple of men for a job."

"Tony knew them?"

"He says no, that he's just seen them around the bar. I believe him maybe ninety percent. They hang out in the back with the other rednecks in charge. Way above Tony's pay grade."

Faith pulled a pair of sunglasses out of her pocket and slid them on. "I verified what Branson told us this morning. She wasn't lying about the shooters. They're mid-level thugs. Nothing this violent in their histories. Certainly not murder for hire."

"What's the prognosis on Fred Zachary, the second shooter?"

"Don't ask me. I can't get near him. His lawyer's set up shop in his hospital room. Won't leave his side."

"That sounds expensive."

“The guy’s part of a fancy firm out of Savannah. Vanhorn and Gresham. They just opened up offices in Macon.” She glanced over to make sure he was following. “It’s the same M.O. as Sarasota and Hilton Head. Big Whitey moves in, he organizes the local scumbags, he gives them fancy lawyers, and he takes out any cops who get in his way.”

Will asked, “Anything off the cell towers?”

“Lena got a text from Paul Vickery around eleven-fifty. Nothing big, just checking if she’s okay. Fifteen minutes later, Long got a blocked call we’re trying to trace. Might take until tomorrow.”

“Fifteen minutes later?”

“Yeah, about ten minutes before the attack.”

Will stared out at the view, which was a depressing mix of interstate and strip malls. “Could be one of Jared’s buddies just calling to check in.”

“Could be.”

“Have you talked to Lena’s team?”

“What’s left of it. DeShawn Franklin seems to think this is no big deal. Paul Vickery is a dick.”

Will ran his hand along his jaw. “He’s upset about his partner almost being murdered. He was here looking for Tony Dell this morning.”

“Did he find him?”

“If Tony gets the crap beaten out of him, then we’ll know he did.”

“Vickery struck me as that kind of guy,” Faith admitted. “Very self-righteous about me wasting his time when he could be out looking for whoever put out the hit on Lena and Jared.”

Will said, “Vickery thinks Bill Black is involved.”

“I’d probably make the same assumption. Black’s a con with a violent history. Dell’s car was at the crime scene. They both work at the same place.”

“My boss told Vickery that Tony Dell and Bill Black are good friends.”

“Nice. How’s that target feel on your back?”

“Stabby,” Will admitted. He’d have to be very careful around Vickery if he ever had the bad fortune to cross paths with him again. “What’s the police station like?”

“They’re all helpful on the surface, but the minute you start to pull at a string, they cut you off.”

“What strings?”

“Incident reports. Daily briefings. They’re not good at producing paperwork, which is odd for a police station.”

Will noted, “It’s been my impression that police officers have to write everything down.”

“Mine, too. Maybe we should go work for Macon.” She leaned back against the shed. “Chief Gray runs a tight ship, but he’s got the press on his back—both Macon and Atlanta—plus there’s talk someone saw a CNN truck heading down 75.”

“Great,” Will mumbled. He’d seldom worked a case where the media made things better.

Faith said, “Gray has every able-bodied cop pounding the streets, including himself. You gotta hand it to the old guy. He’s got his sleeves rolled up just like everybody else. The downside is that Branson’s got the whole station to herself. Her and Paul Vickery. I get the feeling DeShawn Franklin’s heart isn’t in it. He was handpicked by Chief Gray when he took over the force a few years ago. His loyalties have to be torn.”

“You think he’ll flip?”

“Not unless he’s caught in bed with a dead woman or a live boy.” Faith blew out a puff of air. He could tell she was frustrated. “I ran Jared and Lena’s credit, checked their accounts. They pass the smell test. Lena’s Celica is paid off, his truck’s a year out. Low balance on their credit cards. There’s a couple of thou left on Jared’s student loans. Another thou in savings. No big trips or lake houses. They’re a little upside down on their mortgage, but who isn’t?”

“What about their cases?”

“We’re covered up with cases. Jared was trying to win some kind of contest to write the most tickets. Lena’s got a stack of arrests this big.” Faith held her hands a foot apart. “I’ve got four loaners from the field office looking to kill me for drowning them in paperwork. They’re gonna be working eighteen-hour shifts.”

“It’s easier to treat them badly if you don’t know their names.”

“I’ll keep that in mind,” Faith said. “First thing I asked for was the case file on that shooting-gallery raid you read about in the newspaper.”

Will assumed she was drawing this out for a reason. “And?”

“IA has all the files. Every single scrap.”

Internal Affairs. “That makes sense. Two cops were hurt during the raid.”

“Keith McVale and Mitch Cabello. Don’t be impressed. I only found out their names because I checked the duty roster.”

“Did you talk to them?”

“One’s in Florida spending his disability and the other checked himself out of the hospital this morning. He’s not answering my calls and he’s not at home.” She pulled her phone out of her back pocket and swiped the screen a few times before showing some photos to Will. “DeShawn Franklin. Mitch Cabello. Keith McVale.”

Except for skin color, there was a sameness to all the men—square-jawed, clean-cut. The same as Paul Vickery. They were more like a military unit than a detective squad.

Faith said, “There’s a third guy who took off around the same time. Another detective.” She held up the phone so Will could see his photo. “I don’t know how he’s connected, but Eric Haigh applied for administrative leave the day of the raid.”

Will scanned the image, which was more of the same. He guessed, “Unavailable?”

“He won’t even answer his phone.” Faith said, “It’s déjà vu all over again.”

Will knew what she meant. The police forces in Hilton Head and Savannah had both seen an uptick of early retirements and transfer requests the minute Big Whitey started throwing his weight around.

He said, “It’s the same strategy Whitey uses with the dealers. You kill or hurt one cop, it’s easier to get the rest of them to either fall in line or fall away.”

“And then Big Whitey corners the drug market.” Faith changed the subject. “I was so desperate this morning I even tracked down your newspaper stories.” She scrolled to the Web browser on her phone. The Macon Chronicle-Herald blotter was already pulled up. “We know about the shooting-gallery raid—at least that it happened. The two runaways were party girls; they straggled home the next afternoon. The school pot bust was a known offender who will be heading to rehab for his billionth time. The guy on the toilet had a heart attack. He was described as a forty-three-year-old entrepreneur.” Faith looked back up at Will. “I wish I was better at making puns.”

“It’ll come to you.”

She chuckled good-naturedly. "The raid has to be the flashpoint. I hate to admit this, but Denise Branson is good. She's got me completely rope-a-doped."

Will had worked these kinds of cases before. He saved Faith the explanation. "Internal Affairs won't release any paperwork on the shooting-gallery raid until they reach a decision. They can't legally discuss the details because the reputation of an officer or officers is at stake, or because there's possibly going to be a lawsuit. There's a gag order on everyone involved, and even without that, no one will talk to you because you're the bad lady from the state who's sticking her nose where it doesn't belong."

"In a nutshell," Faith confirmed. "I have a teenage son, so I know I should be used to being hated, but this is a whole new level."

Will wanted to tell her it got better, but he couldn't lie.

Faith tucked her phone back into her pocket. "I went in there expecting them to turn on Lena, but she's worshipped around that place. They talk about her like she's the best detective on the squad. I don't get it. And when I ask them why she's so great, they just look at me like it's so obvious, I must be some kind of idiot for not seeing it."

Will couldn't explain why Lena engendered such loyalty. He'd witnessed it in Grant County, too. For someone who continually screwed up, she seemed to have more than her fair share of supporters.

He asked, "What about Denise Branson? Did you get a temperature on her?"

"They're a bit cold on her, but that's to be expected. She's higher up the food chain. She's self-confident. She's a woman. Three strikes." Faith asked, "What else did you get out of Tony Dell?"

"Big Whitey this, Big Whitey that."

"That makes me nervous."

Will didn't address her concern. They'd had many conversations about how dangerous it felt for Tony Dell to keep throwing the name around. "I convinced him Big Whitey's probably going to kill us. Loose ends."

"Makes sense." Faith stared at the interstate. Will could guess her thoughts, which more than likely mirrored his own: It was time to make a move on Big Whitey. Will would have to get in deeper with Tony Dell, possibly through Cayla the pharmacy nurse.

He said, "Tony thinks we should try to arrange a sit-down. Let Big Whitey know we're not a threat. See if we can do business with him."

Faith nodded, but she still didn't look at Will. "Give me the details as soon as you have them."

"Maybe you could tape a gun to the back of the toilet tank for me." She didn't respond. "Like in the—"

"I've seen The Godfather."

Will followed her gaze to the line of cars. I-475 was backing up with lunchtime traffic. Every big-box store and fast-food restaurant imaginable was crammed along the exit.

He asked, "You think of a pun yet? For the entrepreneur on the toilet?"

"It doesn't seem so funny anymore."

Will stared back at the cars. A truck swerved into the wrong lane to pass a van. Horns blared. Faith lifted her hat and brushed her hair back up underneath it.

He asked, "Is she okay?"

Faith shook her head. "I haven't heard a word come out of her mouth. It's like talking to a brick wall. She won't respond to anything. Won't look at me. I was thinking about holding a mirror under her nose to make sure she's still alive."

Will waited for Faith to realize that wasn't the question.

She said, "Sara's all right. Tired. She didn't say, but I can tell it's hard for her to be here."

Will nodded.

She finally looked up at him. "You need to tell her, Will. This is getting too close to the bone."

He rubbed his jaw. He felt a knot coming up where Vickery had punched him. "Lena didn't say anything?"

Faith stared at him for a second longer, then shook her head again. "I tried to go in there like she was just another witness. Then I tried to talk to her like a cop. But the whole time, I've got sweat dripping down my back because all I can think is am I going to be the next cop she gets killed." Faith shrugged her shoulders when she added, "Or you."

Will wasn't sure what to say. He shrugged his shoulders, too.

They both turned when they heard a cackling laugh. A group of doctors had made their way up to the roof. Will walked gingerly around the shed. He kept his back to the metal wall. The pea gravel crunched as the group walked toward the edge of the building.

He checked that the coast was clear, then slipped through the door.

Will looked over the railing before heading down the stairs. His toolbox was still outside the ICU. He grabbed the handle and pushed open the door. And then his heart stopped because he hadn't checked the window first. Luckily, no one was there but the cop and the nurse.

The man's hand went to his gun.

Will held up his ID. "Maintenance. I got a report that a pipe's leaking?"

The cop gave Will a hard look. His hand stayed on his gun.

"Officer Raleigh, it's okay." The nurse stood up from her desk. "Lordy, Bud, it took you long enough." She apologized quickly. "I'm sorry, that's probably not your fault."

"I'm sorry anyway," Will told her. "Got hung up on the last job."

"It's Ruth." She smiled, motioning for him to follow her.

Will hefted the toolbox into his other hand as he walked down the hall. He had been in the ICU once before to check a hissing air conditioner. The basic layout was a horseshoe that squared off around the nurses' station. The rooms were small. The only windows looked into the hallway. Will guessed patients in the ICU didn't really care about sunlight, but the whole floor made him feel claustrophobic.

Officer Raleigh blocked the doorway to Jared's room. He grabbed the ID hanging around Will's neck. He scrutinized Bill Black's photo. Will was close enough to see the fine down on the young officer's cheek.

"What's the deal here?" Ruth seemed perplexed. "This is Buddy. He's been up here before."

Will studied the woman. She was older with dark hair that showed a little gray at the part. He wasn't sure why she kept covering for him. Will was pretty good at remembering faces and he was certain he'd never met this particular nurse before.

"All right." Raleigh finally moved out of Will's way.

Will tried to keep his expression neutral as he walked into the room, but Lena, who was folded into a chair in the corner, wasn't as careful. Her mouth opened in surprise.

Ruth misunderstood her reaction. She told Lena, "I'm sorry, sweetheart. We need to get this leak checked out. Only take a minute."

Will couldn't help it. He looked everywhere in the room but at Jared.

"It's there." Ruth pointed at a brown spot in the ceiling.

Will was tall enough to reach up and touch it. The tile was wet and smelled like apples. He looked at the food tray beside Jared's bed. The apple juice container was empty.

Will lowered his hand. Ruth was watching him in a way that made him uncomfortable.

She winked at him, then said in a breathy whisper, "I'm a friend of Cayla's."

Will was trying to summon up one of Bill Black's grunts when Faith finally appeared.

"What the hell's going on?" She directed her anger at the cop. "I know Chief Gray taught you better than this. Did you check this guy out?"

Raleigh hesitated. He clearly had a healthy fear of his chief. "The guy's got an ID."

"You can get those at Kinko's." Faith nodded toward the doors. "Go downstairs and check with HR."

"Yes, ma'am." Had Raleigh been a few years older, he would've told Faith where to stick her order, but he was new enough to jump when she snapped her fingers.

Ruth looked up at the ceiling, all business as she asked Will, "What do you think, Bud?"

Will looked up, too. "I think something's leaking."

Faith suggested, "Maybe we can move Mr. Long to a different room?"

Ruth shook her head. "It's just me up here for the next hour and I can't move him by myself." Faith offered, "I can help."

"We're not really allowed to—"

Will interrupted, "I'll need the room cleared anyway." He pushed up the ceiling tile and used the flashlight on his belt to look inside the drop ceiling. Will had been looking into ceilings in the hospital almost every day of the last ten. He knew that his chances of finding at least one suspicious-looking pipe were good, but the nest of lines crisscrossing the ICU still surprised him.

He pushed the tile aside so everyone could see as he tried to sound authoritative. "That'll be oxygen, the condense line for the AC, PVC pipe, some old polybute. I'm gonna need a schematic so —"

"I get it," Ruth stopped him. "Let me call my supervisor and see if I can get her up here."

She left, Faith on her heels. Will kept his flashlight pointed toward the ceiling, but his eyes were on Jared Long.

The young man's face had blown up like a balloon. There were tubes sticking out of everything. His eyes were taped shut. Dried blood was caked around his nostrils. The flesh on his hands was a waxy, yellow color. No cop wanted to see another cop in a hospital bed. Will wasn't normally superstitious, but he had to suppress the shiver working its way up his spine.

Then again, Jared Long wasn't the only cautionary tale in the room.

Slowly, like she didn't want to break anything, Lena uncurled herself from the chair.

Will asked, "You holding up?"

"No." She stood on the other side of the bed with her arms wrapped around her waist. "Sara doesn't know you're doing this, does she?"

Lena had always been an astute observer, but Will wasn't going to talk to her about Sara. He glanced over his shoulder, checking Ruth. The nurse was talking on the phone. Faith was practically glued to her side.

Lena said, "I won't tell her. I haven't told anybody." She rubbed her lips together. They were cracked and dry. "You'll find out eventually. I'm good at keeping my mouth shut. I've learned to do the right thing."

Will asked, "What happened last night?"

"They shot him." Lena stopped the story there, dismissing her involvement in a wholly predictable way. Still, Will could tell she was reeling from the aftershock. Her eyes were bloodshot. The bruise under her eye mottled the skin. She couldn't seem to keep her balance. Her pupils were wide open, though he didn't know if that was from the dark room or some kind of medication.

He said, "Tell me what brought this on."

Her head moved slowly side to side.

“Was it the raid last week?” He paused. “Two cops were hurt. Were you part of that? Were you on the team?”

She paused before answering, “I’m not allowed to talk about the raid.”

“You and I both know you don’t play by the rules.”

“Ask Branson.”

“I’m asking you.”

Her head started shaking again. She looked down at Jared. Her voice was barely a whisper when she told her husband, “I’m sorry, baby. I’m so sorry.”

Will said, “Lena, something happened to set this off.”

She didn’t respond.

He tried to be diplomatic. “Did Jared pull somebody over who might want to hurt him?”

She gave Will a confused look, as if it never occurred to her that a motorcycle cop working part of a drug corridor that ran up the Eastern Seaboard might find himself in a dangerous situation.

She asked, “You think he got in the way of some traffickers?”

“I don’t know. You tell me.”

She seemed to think about it. “They would’ve shot him then and there.”

Will knew she was right, but he still asked, “Jared didn’t mention anything?”

“We weren’t really talking.”

Will let her words settle. He wasn’t surprised there was marital discord. The first thing he’d seen when he walked through the front door of their house was a pillow and sheet on the couch.

Will asked, “What about you?”

“What about me?”

Will checked on Ruth again. Faith made a motion with her hand, indicating that there wasn’t much time.

He tried to keep his patience as he told Lena, “Whatever brought this on—I know you didn’t mean to do it. You’re not a bad person. But you did something, and it got us here, and you need to tell me what that thing is so I can stop whoever did this.”

There was still a small shake to Lena’s head. Her hand was resting on the guardrail. She flexed open her fingers, letting the tips graze the sheet covering Jared’s body.

Will said, “You know you can trust me. There’s a reason I’m here.”

She didn't acknowledge his plea. "Your partner. You work with her long?"

"Faith." Will tasted blood on his tongue. Without thinking, he'd chewed at the cut in his cheek. "A while."

"She any good?"

"Yes." Will tried another tack. "Who's Big Whitey?" That snapped her out of it. He saw a flash of anger as the old Lena started to surface. "What did Branson say?"

"Who is he?"

"No one." She seemed genuinely afraid now. "He doesn't exist. He's a lie."

"Lena—"

"Stop." Her voice took on a pleading tone. "Listen to me, Will. If you love Sara, you'll stay away from this." She gripped the bed rail, desperate. "I mean it. Stay away."

Will looked back at the nurse again. She was obviously finishing up her phone call.

He told Lena, "Talk to me. Let me help you."

Lena shook her head. Tears started to flow. "We're supposed to protect people. We're supposed to keep them safe."

"The best way to keep Jared safe is—"

"How do you decide?" She swallowed hard. The sound was louder than the hum of the machines. "How do you decide whose life is more important?" Her hand went to her stomach. The palm was flat, fingers splayed. "He would want this," she whispered. "This is what Jared would want me to do."

Faith cleared her throat loud enough to announce her return.

Ruth was behind her. She asked Will, "How bad is the leak? I mean, are we talking the whole ceiling's gonna come down?"

Will took his time, clicking off the flashlight, dropping it back into the loop on his belt. Finally, he shook his head and shrugged at the same time. "I won't know until I get up there."

Ruth sighed. "It's gonna be an hour before my boss can help move him. Can you come back?"

Bill Black took over. "You're gonna have to put in another request."

Ruth sighed again, but she was obviously used to dealing with the hospital bureaucracy. "All right, Buddy. Thanks for coming, anyway." She went to Jared and started checking the machines. Lena watched her like a hawk. It was unnerving the way she just stood there. Except for stretching her fingers, she didn't reach out to him. She barely looked at his face.

Ruth must've felt it, too. She told Lena, "It's okay to touch him, hon. He's not gonna break." As if to prove this, she put her hand to Jared's cheek. And then she kept it there. Her brow furrowed.

Something was wrong.

Ruth's hand went to Jared's forehead. Then his neck. Then his wrist. She looked at her watch, checking his pulse against the flashing number on the monitor. Will could see the thumping heart was beating faster than usual. The blood pressure was low.

"What is it?" Faith asked.

"He's just a little clammy." Ruth grabbed the control and raised the foot of the bed. The floor vibrated beneath Will's feet. The nurse put some false cheer in her tone. "I'm sure it's nothing, but let me get the doctor, all right?" She left the room at a brisk pace. Faith followed her, though Will doubted Lena would tell him anything else.

He picked up his toolbox. He tried one last time. "Lena, I know you think you've got all of this under control, but you don't."

She didn't look up as she said, "I've never been able to control anything in my life."

Will waited, giving her another chance to come clean. She ignored him. She just stood there staring down at Jared. Her hand was still pressed flat to her stomach. Her mouth moved soundlessly, as if in prayer.

All Will could do was leave the room. Ruth was on the phone by her desk. She barely registered his presence, which Will took as a bad sign. Jared's condition was obviously a more serious matter than she'd let on.

He walked down the hallway toward Faith. She was reading her emails. Or pretending to. Will could see the screen was dark.

He stopped a few feet away from her and opened his toolbox.

Faith kept her voice low. "Well?"

Will found his clipboard and pen. He looked at Ruth again. She had her back to him, the phone pressed to her ear.

Still, he kept his voice down. "She's protecting someone."

"She's protecting herself."

Will wasn't so sure about that. He checked some boxes on his form. "I think she was at the raid on the shooting gallery. She told me she wasn't allowed to talk about it."

“Of course she was at the raid. I wouldn’t be surprised if she was leading it.”

“She warned me off Big Whitey.”

Faith looked up from her BlackBerry.

Will kept checking boxes. He was giving himself time to decide whether or not to tell Faith the rest. In the end, he knew he didn’t have a choice. “She told me if I love Sara, I’ll drop the case.”

Faith looked back at her phone. Her thumb scrolled across the black screen. She seldom registered any emotion beyond irritation, but Will could tell Lena’s words had hit home.

She asked, “Why do I get the feeling that, five years ago, she told Jeffrey Tolliver the same thing?”

7.

THE DAY BEFORE THE RAID

Lena sat at her desk staring at her computer monitor. Fireworks filled the screen. She knew if she tapped one of the keys, the desktop would appear. She also knew what the files would be—open cases, closed cases, court documents, witness statements, suspect statements—endless bytes of data that summed up the lives of thousands of people.

There was only one life on the computer that she cared about.

Not that there was life anymore.

Lena closed her eyes. Let the grief have its way.

She had been electrocuted once. Not electrocuted like on death row, but shocked by an electric current. Lena was fifteen when it happened. She'd been helping Sibyl with her hair. They were both standing in front of the mirror. The glass was steamed over from a recent shower. The smell of mold was in the air.

The house they grew up in had been wired by their uncle Hank, so they were used to smoking outlets and popping lightbulbs. He'd also built the bookcases that had no shelves, and removed a load-bearing wall, which resulted in the roof settling into a camel-back sway. Just walking through the front door, you knew you were taking your life into your own hands.

Which is why Lena should've known better than to plug in the hair dryer without first unplugging the box fan. The shock had streaked up her arm, down her spine, then legs, and into the tips of her toes, which happened to be touching standing water from the shower. There was some sort of delay. Lena didn't feel the brunt of the electrocution until she saw the water. She thought, This is dangerous. The lights zapped out. Her body seized. Then, the next thing she knew, she was lying on the bathroom floor and Sibyl was screaming for Hank to call an ambulance.

That's what Lena felt like now—shocked. Almost electrocuted. Laid flat on her back. Her body tensed. Her nerves on fire. Only this time, there was no one around to help her. This time, she was completely alone.

Lena watched the colorful bursts of light explode across the computer screen. She rested her hand on the mouse. She gently pressed down. The desktop came up. She moved the arrow to the file that contained the ultrasound. Lena had torn up the photo, but the video remained. Her hand froze on the mouse. She didn't need to open the file. She didn't need to see the picture. The image was forever seared into her retinas. She felt weak as rain every time she saw it.

Little black bubble. White folds and ridges. The tiny flutter of a beating heart that was no bigger than a drop of rain.

How could she love something so much when she couldn't even see it with her naked eye? How could she feel that heart beat inside of her when it took a machine just to let her know it was there?

How could she have lost it so easily?

How could one horrible moment erase weeks of happiness, destroy a prospective lifetime that had made Lena's heart feel weightless with anticipation?

The arrow hovered over the file. There was a slight shake to the image.

Her cell phone rang. Lena moved her hand off the mouse and picked up the phone. "Detective Adams."

"Oh." The woman seemed surprised that Lena had answered.

"Yes?" Lena asked. She touched her hand to the mouse. She didn't need to see the file again. She should get rid of it. Throw it in the computer's trash.

"Ma'am?" the woman said. "Hello?"

"Yes." Lena turned away from the computer. She made herself listen to the call.

The woman was saying, "... from Dr. Benedict's office? You saw me yesterday?"

Lena couldn't stand people who raised their voices at the end of every sentence. "Are you calling about the bill? We haven't gotten it yet."

"Oh, no, of course not." She sounded offended. "I just wanted to check on you? Your husband said you were back at work?"

Lena rubbed her eyes with her fingers. Jared had slept on the couch last night. He was gone this morning when Lena woke up. She'd checked the duty roster when she got in. He'd changed shifts so he didn't have to see her.

"Ma'am?"

Lena dropped her hand. "Is there something you wanted?"

"Dr. Benedict asked me to check on you, see if the cramping's subsided?"

Lena put her hand to her stomach. "It's better," she said, not knowing whether or not this was the truth. Every time she thought about it, she could feel it happening all over again. The excruciating pain that woke her from a deep sleep. The panic as she tried to dress herself. The fear as they raced to the hospital. The agony as they heard the doctor's words. The screaming argument she'd gotten into with Jared when they got home.

He wouldn't let Lena throw away the bloody sheets. He said she was trying to pretend it hadn't happened. That she was unfeeling. Incapable of grieving. That throwing away the sheets was her way of getting rid of the evidence.

As if Lena needed a visual reminder to understand what she had lost.

They had lost.

"Ma'am?"

Lena shook her head, trying to get rid of the thoughts. "Yes?"

"I asked, no excessive bleeding?"

Lena didn't know what "excessive" meant. She had no point of reference.

"Mrs. Long?" The woman's voice filled with a warmth that was ten times worse than her stupid interrogatory tone. "I can have Dr. Benedict write you a note for work. You shouldn't be back so soon. Most women take a few weeks, sometimes a month or even two if they can get off that long."

"Well, I can't do that," Lena said. Yesterday was bad enough. They'd gotten home from the hospital around ten in the morning. Lena had slept away the afternoon, then stayed up arguing with Jared well into the night. The thought of being trapped at home again with nothing to do but wait for Jared to walk through the door was unbearable. Besides, no one at work even knew she was pregnant.

Had been pregnant.

Lena told the woman, "I have work to do."

"I'm sure you do, Mrs. Long, but people will understand. What you lost—"

"I'm fine," Lena interrupted. She wanted to correct her, to tell the woman that her last name was Adams, that Jared had told her to keep it because Lena Long sounded like something you'd buy off an infomercial.

Instead, Lena said, "I don't need a note. Thank you."

"Oh, darlin', please don't hang up." She was obviously concerned. "You should go home. Be with your husband. Trust me, he might not be showing it, but he's hurting just as much as you."

Lena pressed her fingers into her eyes again. Jared was showing it. Lena was the problem. According to her husband, she was some kind of machine. She wasn't the woman he'd married. He wasn't sure she was the woman he wanted to stay married to.

Lena looked at the clock. She had a briefing in five minutes. Her team was waiting for her. She should end the call. She should shut up. But the words came out of her mouth before she could stop them. "I wondered—"

Instead of pushing Lena, or making an inane statement with her voice raised at the end, the woman was silent. The trick was a good one. Lena used it in interrogations. People naturally wanted to fill silences, especially when they felt guilty about something.

Lena said, "I had an abortion."

Still the woman was silent.

"Six years ago." Lena put her hand to her face. Her skin felt hot to the touch. "I wondered—"

"No. That has nothing to do with what happened the other night." The answer had a certain finality to it. "If that were the case, I wouldn't have my two little ones."

Lena felt some of the tension leave her chest. She opened her mouth for air. For just a moment, she could breathe again.

The woman said, "Give yourself time to grieve. You and your husband can try again. Trust me, what you're going through now—it gets easier. It doesn't ever go away, but it gets different."

Lena pulled a box of tissues out of her desk. She had to get her shit together. She was at work. She had to stop dwelling on this. There was no way she could lead her team if they saw her sobbing at her desk. She wiped her eyes, blew her nose.

“Okay,” Lena told the woman. “Thank you. I need to get back to work.”

“Mrs. Long. Lena. You really should go home. Don’t do this to yourself. Nobody gets a medal for being tough.”

“Okay.” Lena made her voice stronger. “Thank you for calling. I have to go.”

“But—”

Lena hung up the phone. She blew her nose again. She wiped her eyes until they felt raw. Maybe it was different at a doctor’s office, but at the police station, they gave out medals all the time for being tough.

Lena turned to her computer. She clicked on the ultrasound file and dragged it into the trashcan. She clicked on the Finder menu, then scrolled down to Empty Trash. Her finger stayed pressed down on the mouse. Her heart thumped in her chest.

“Lee?” Paul Vickery banged on the door as he walked into her office. He stopped. “What’s wrong? Somebody yank your nose hair?”

“I’ve gotta stupid cold.” Lena scrolled back up the menu, went to Edit, then selected Undo Move to Trash. She didn’t look up at Paul until she saw the file safely back on her desktop. “What is it?”

“You make a decision yet, boss?”

The decision. They’d planned the raid for next week, but their snitch had told them a big shipment was coming in tonight. Even before she lost the baby, Lena wasn’t comfortable moving up the schedule. She wanted more time to prepare. Apparently, no one else felt this way. She was feeling pressure from all sides to go in. More money, more guns, more dope, more jail time.

She told Paul, “Yeah, everybody else knows but you.”

“Just checking, Kemosabe. No need to get your panties in a wad.”

She heard a familiar chug from her computer. Paul wasn’t the only one who was getting antsy. Denise Branson had sent another email. Lena scanned the first line, which dove straight into the fact that after last night’s overtime, Lena’s investigation had crossed the one-million-dollar mark.

“Damn, girl.” Paul read over her shoulder. “You pissed her off something righteous. What’re you gonna do?”

“She’ll be fine once she gets her picture in the paper.”

“Vanhorn and Gresham,” Paul read from the email. “Sid Waller’s lawyer’s from that firm, right?”

Lena clicked the email closed as she stood up. “We’re gonna draw straws to see who goes down into the basement first. I’m gonna hold them. One person gets to pick from each team.”

Paul grinned like a possum. “Good thing I’m feeling lucky, partner.”

“Did y’all finish taping off the diagram?”

“Yeah. Had to keep DeShawn from using his protractor.”

“Good. We’re going to rehearse this thing until we know it in our sleep.” Lena grabbed her jacket on the way out.

Paul said, “It’s eighty degrees in the shop.”

“Thanks for the weather update.” Lena pulled on the jacket as she walked down the hallway. Her hormones were still out of whack. She was cold all the time, except when she was burning up. That’s what she should’ve asked that stupid woman from Dr. Benedict’s office about, not something that had happened six years ago.

Paul said, “You’re going to—”

“Shit.” The zip was caught in her shirt.

“Here.” Paul stood in front of her. He started working on the zipper like she was three. Paul wasn’t the only one who’d been treating her more delicately lately. Lena guessed she was putting out some pregnant woman pheromones. Or at least she had been.

Paul said, “I think we’re gonna have a problem with Eric. He’s acting weird.”

“How?”

“He’s being too quiet.” He added, “That thing in the van the other day was funny, but he’s hiding something.”

“Hiding what?”

“Exactly.”

Lena watched Paul’s fingers as he tried to free her shirt from the zipper. She thought about the little blue jacket she’d ordered online. Jared’s family loved Auburn football to the point of making it a religion. Lena had yelled at him for painting the nursery, but she couldn’t resist going online last week and ordering a baby-sized Auburn hoodie from Tiger Rags.

The jacket was on back order. She wondered when it would be delivered. What day in the near future would she go home and find a tiny jacket waiting for little arms that would never exist?

“Lee?” Paul asked. “Where’d you go?”

She shook her head. “It’s too late to switch out Eric. He’s just gonna have to man up.”

He finally freed the zipper. “You’re the boss.”

The word grated; it had started taking on mocking undertones. “Lucky me,” she muttered. Technically, their lieutenant was supposed to be the boss, but a particularly aggressive form of leukemia had taken him out of the equation and Denise Branson had yet to find a suitable replacement. At first, Lena had been happy to fill the role, but now she was seeing the downside of her new responsibilities.

Paul said, “Shit, look smart.” He puffed out his chest and pressed his back to the wall as he stood at attention.

Lena didn’t have to ask why. Lonnie Gray was talking on his cell phone as he walked down the hallway. He ended the call when he saw Paul and Lena. There was no preamble. He asked, “Status?”

Lena provided, “We’re doing run-throughs. No mistakes this time. We’re gonna nail Waller.”

Gray’s voice was stern. “That’s exactly what needs to happen, Detective.”

“Yes, sir,” she said, knowing he wasn’t kidding around. Lena had seen more than one detective leave the Macon PD before he was planning to because he’d disappointed the chief. “You have my word that the entire team is at one hundred percent.”

Paul added, “You can count on us, sir,” sounding like a third-grader bringing an apple to his teacher.

“Good.” Gray headed back down the hallway, but not before giving Paul a curt nod. Lena could practically hear Vickery’s ball sac quiver. She felt the same respect toward Gray, but she hoped she didn’t look like she was creaming her pants every time the chief was around.

As soon as Gray was gone, Paul clapped his hands together. “You heard the chief. Let’s rock this bad boy.”

He preceded Lena down the hall toward the shop. Paul was obviously pumped, and not just because of the chief. He walked on the balls of his feet in that weird way that made him look a little effeminate. Lena knew Paul had served two tours in Afghanistan before a piece of shrapnel got lodged in his arm. Physical therapy had brought him back to one hundred percent, but being home had made him lose his taste for war.

Paul still relished a good fight, though—one of the many characteristics they both shared. At first, Lena thought their matched temperaments made for a good partnership, but she was beginning to see that maybe a differing opinion would offer a better balance.

Part of the reason Lena had respected Jeffrey Tolliver so much was that he'd always told Lena when he thought she was wrong.

Paul kicked open the door to the shop. The sound of metal hitting metal reverberated through the hangar-like building. The shop was where they brought seized automobiles and boats so they could take them apart and look for drugs or contraband. They also used it to do routine maintenance on the squad cars, which was why three cruisers were hanging on lifts.

The mechanics had cleared out a large space for Lena's team to work. The footprint of the shooting-gallery house was thirty-five by sixty, and even in the large building, space was at a premium. They were using the log sergeant's duty desk as their workspace, which had infuriated the sergeant, but orders were orders. Lena was surprised Denise Branson hadn't taken the space away from them. She was pissed enough at Lena to strike out, and Branson didn't get to the rank of major without knowing how to punish people.

DeShawn Franklin, Mitch Cabello, and Keith McVale stood around the duty desk. Lena took the lead ahead of Paul. She lengthened her stride so that he wouldn't pass her. Back in Grant County, Lena had been the only female detective on an all-male force. She knew the rules when she signed up. Every second of the day, she had to fight to keep her place in the pecking order.

"Hey, boss." Mitch looked up from the diagram they had gotten from the tax assessor's office. "You gotta cold?"

Lena knew what she probably looked like: red-rimmed eyes, bloodshot from crying. She wiped under her nose with the back of her hand. "Yeah. Jared gave it to me."

"I bet he gave it to you." DeShawn made a grunting sound that invited a chorus of porn music from the team.

"Shut up, assholes. I just ran into Chief Gray in the hall. He made it clear we'd better come back here with Waller or keep on driving out of town." She gave DeShawn a pointed look. "That means you, too, golden boy."

Mitch made a “rut-roh” sound straight out of a Scooby-Doo cartoon, though they all knew DeShawn was one of Gray’s favorites.

Lena looked around the shop. The mechanics had gone to lunch and the duty sergeant was probably sulking in his car. The B-Team had worked surveillance last night. Lena told them they could come in late. During the raid, they were assigned to guarding the perimeter, so they didn’t need to run the inside drills like the rest of them.

Still, someone was missing.

She asked, “Where’s Eric?”

DeShawn provided, “Shitting out lunch from the sound of it.”

Lena glanced at Paul, whose face tended to show every single thought that crossed his mind. He was still worried about Eric. Maybe he had a right to be. To mangle the old saying, Eric’s stomach was the window to his soul.

DeShawn asked, “Something wrong, boss?”

Lena tried to summon up her old self. “Yeah, I gotta bunch of little girls on my team.”

They greeted this with the expected howls and finger pointing.

Lena ignored them. She looked down at the concrete floor where they had taped off the house. The diagram was to exact scale. Den, two bedrooms, bathroom, dining room, kitchen. They could pace off the steps here so that it came as second nature when they were doing the raid in real time. The only unknown was the basement.

Thumb latch. Deadbolt. Slide lock. There was no telling how the door would be secured, though they had wasted plenty of time considering the options.

The biggest issue was the four guys, maybe five, who were usually in the house. Sometimes a couple of junkies stayed the night, but that tended to be after a weekend of partying. Traffic started flowing around seven-thirty in the morning—either kids on their way to school or adults on their way to work. Two or three hours later, the moms came in their SUVs, seeking a bump to get them through their daily chores. Lunchtime traffic was unreliable, but rush hour started at four-thirty and didn’t slow down until after three in the morning.

This was when Sid Waller showed up. Like clockwork, he took the northbound exit onto Allman Road, hung a left onto Redding Street, then slowly drove his Corvette down the rutted gravel driveway to the shooting gallery.

Waller usually stayed at the house for three hours. No one knew what he did while he was there. It was too dangerous to send in the snitches at that time of day. They were usually passed out by then, anyway. Paul thought Waller was sampling the product. DeShawn thought he was banging some girls. Denise Branson thought he was counting all the money.

Lena prayed to God he was doing all three, and that by the time they made their way into that dark, dank basement, Sid Waller was too stoned, too fucked, and too scared to do anything but watch helplessly as Lena ratcheted the cuffs around his wrists.

She looked up. They were all waiting on her. DeShawn was staring at his hands like he was trying to decide whether or not he needed a manicure. Mitch and Keith were mumbling to each other because the two of them couldn't shut up if you held a gun to their heads. Paul's face said it all. He was like a puppy, bouncing around on his feet, about to wet himself with anticipation.

The door creaked open. Eric Haigh gave a sheepish smile as he walked into the shop. Paul was right. There was something off about the man. He seemed too hesitant, which became enormously clear as he joined the rest of the team around the desk. They were all ready to go. Eric looked like the only place he wanted to go was back out the door he'd just walked in.

Well, they all had shit going on in their lives.

"All right, ladies." Lena clapped her hands together. "Decision's been made. We're hitting this place at oh-dark-thirty tomorrow morning."

8.

THURSDAY

Sara sat in the passenger's seat of Nell's truck watching the Macon landscape scroll by. Atlanta was a city filled with beautiful gardens and trees, but there was something about being surrounded by a forest that made Sara feel at home. Like Macon, Grant County was a college town, located in a part of the state that still moved at a slower speed. Just seeing the trees made Sara feel like her lungs were working again. The vulture on her shoulder had temporarily left its perch. She felt more like herself.

Maybe it wasn't entirely the scenery that had brought her this sense of calm. While Nell was shopping for cleaning supplies, Sara had frantically poured her heart out in a long email to her sister. Tessa's response had been just as long, but instead of filling the message with clichés about soldiering on or enjoying sweet revenge, she'd made lists: Ten things she loved about Will Trent. Three of the stupidest jokes their father had ever told. Eight new words that Tessa had said around Izzie, Sara's niece, that would probably end up sending Tessa to hell. Six reasons no one would ever be able to make biscuits as good as their grandmother's. Five things that their mother did that they both swore they would never, ever do, but that they were now doing almost every single day of their lives.

The only direct acknowledgment to Sara's situation came in the postscript:

Please don't start listening to Dolly Parton again.

Nell said, "I do that all the time."

Sara was pulled from her thoughts. "What's that?"

"Remember something about Jeffrey and smile." Nell smiled, too. "He loved being in the woods. Used to go hiking all the time when he was in high school."

Sara opened her mouth to correct her, then thought better of it.

“It’s all right,” Nell said. “You save whatever story you just thought of for Jared when he wakes up. We’ll all smile about it then.”

Sara nodded. This was a familiar refrain that Nell had started the minute they’d left the hospital. She needed to get some clean pajamas for when Jared woke up. She needed to make sure the house was clean for when Jared woke up. Sara didn’t begrudge Nell the goal. She could tell it was the only thing keeping her going.

Nell’s cell phone beeped. She was using the GPS to find Lena and Jared’s house. “I guess it’s down here,” she murmured, taking a lazy, right-hand turn.

Sara pressed her lips together. Nell drove like an old woman, never exceeding the speed limit, slowing to let over every car that even looked as if it might want to merge. Occasionally, she would stop the truck in order to read a sign or remark on a pedestrian. She was still stuck in small-town time, where rushing was considered rude and you didn’t beep your horn unless a dog was in the road.

Nell took in the houses lining the street. “Not too bad,” she commented, which was the most positive thing she’d said about Macon since they got into the truck. “I guess they got all the plans from the same magazine.”

Sara followed her gaze. There was a uniformity to the subdivision, but the houses weren’t overbuilt for the lots or stuffed with extra bedrooms that no one would ever use. People kept their lawns tended. There were minivans in the driveways. American flags hung from porch posts. The street looked exactly like the kind where you’d expect to find two police officers living.

Nell didn’t need her GPS anymore. She parked near a white GBI crime scene van. Charlie Reed stood at the open back doors. A younger man handed him plastic crates that Charlie packed carefully into the cargo area. Sara recognized the sealed evidence bags from her medical examiner days. The past started to creep up again, especially when she noticed the two cops standing around a cruiser parked at the end of the street.

“Well,” Nell said. She was looking up at the house with some trepidation.

Sara guessed the woman had been expecting something closer to a witch’s cottage, not the quaint, single-story clapboard house at the top of a steep hill. The structure was shotgun style, deeper than it was wide, with the front door planted squarely in the middle. Instead of an American flag on the front porch, there was an orange and blue banner with the logo of Auburn University.

Nell seemed to approve of the flag. She said, "At least he's still standing where he's from."

Sara made some mumbling noises that might be interpreted as encouragement. Maybe it wasn't Nell, but Sara who was having a hard time thinking about Lena living in this house. The lawn was a dark carpet of green. There were some leggy petunias planted around the mailbox. Monkey grass splashed over the front walk. The front door was painted red. More petunias spilled from wooden planters on the porch. Sara couldn't imagine Lena tending flowers, let alone sitting down and taking notes from a book on feng shui.

"You coming?" Nell asked.

Sara pushed open the door. The air felt chilly compared to the stuffy cab of the truck. The police officers at the end of the street stared with open curiosity. Sara waved. She got two nods in return.

Nell told Sara, "I'm'll call Possum and see if he checked in with the nurse yet." She flipped open her phone and dialed the number. Her hand went to her hip. She looked up at the house as she waited for Possum to answer.

Sara hoped Nell was reconsidering her plans. The first thirty minutes of their drive had been spent discussing the realities of what cleaning the crime scene would entail. Sara hadn't held back toward the end. She'd been fairly brutal, which only seemed to galvanize Nell's resolve.

Nell spoke into the phone, "How is he?"

Sara walked away from the truck to give her privacy. A breeze stirred the air as she headed toward the crime scene van. Sara rubbed her arms, wishing she'd thought to bring a jacket.

"Dr. Linton." Charlie Reed smiled at Sara. He was a nice-looking man except for a well-groomed handlebar mustache, which gave him the appearance of a lounge singer. "Please tell me Amanda finally managed to snag us your services?"

"Lord no." The last thing on earth Sara would ever want to do is work for Amanda Wagner. "I'm here with a friend." She indicated Nell. "Her son's Jared Long."

“Oh.” Charlie’s smile dropped. “Surely, she doesn’t want to see ...?”

“Worse than that. She wants to clean it up.”

Charlie indicated for Sara to follow him to the front of the van. He glanced at Nell, probably to make sure she couldn’t hear them. “It’s pretty bad in there. I mean, not as bad as most, but they used a shotgun and there was quite a struggle. The volume of blood—”

Sara held up her hands. “I would gladly leave right now if I thought I could get her to go with me.”

Charlie looked at Nell again. Her determination must’ve been apparent. “Well, it’s good that she has you here to walk her through it.”

“I’m still trying to change her mind.”

“She doesn’t look like the type who does that,” he noted. “I can give you a quick rundown if you like?”

Sara nodded, ashamed that she was so eager to hear the details.

Charlie’s voice took on a practiced tone. “The man we’re calling Assailant Two entered through the front window.” He indicated the window in question. Black fingerprint powder smeared the white trim. “He more than likely used a pocketknife. Slid it between the frames, pushed open the thumb latch.”

Sara nodded. The entry method was typical for burglaries.

He continued, “We can assume from fingerprints that Assailant Two then opened the front door, letting the man we’re calling Assailant One enter the house. From the gunpowder residue on the floor and walls, we can conclude the first assailant was standing in the front room at the mouth of the hall when he initially fired the shotgun. Sawn-off Remington 870, twenty-eight gauge.”

Sara knew from past cases that a shotgun blast from that distance could rip apart a half-inch piece of plywood. The sawed-off barrel had spread the pellets, which was probably the only reason Jared hadn’t dropped dead on the spot.

Charlie said, “I’ve read the hospital admitting report. My preliminary field investigation supports the shotgun pellets mostly clustered in a twenty-centimeter circle in the victim’s thoracic region, roughly T-2 through T-7, with some penetrating the skull. At the scene, a few pellets were found lodged into the wood around the doorframe. We can assume that the majority of the pellets went into the victim.”

Sara had gotten out of the practice of listening to people talk as if they were giving testimony. “Jared was standing in the doorway?”

“Yes. The victim’s body was almost exactly centered in the doorway. He likely had his arms crossed or in front of him. According to the hospital report, he had no wounds on the back of his arms or hands. He was wearing a toolbelt, which we can surmise is where Detective Adams got the hammer.”

Sara had been wondering about that detail. She didn’t imagine Lena kept a hammer in the bedroom, though who knew what the hell she got up to.

Charlie continued, “Adams used the hammer to take out the first assailant, the shooter, at the doorway to the bedroom.” He pointed just below his eye socket. “Claw went in here. Got lodged in the orbita, went straight through the vitreous. The shotgun went off a second time, blasting a hole approximately thirty-two centimeters into the far wall. At some point, the assailant fell to the floor, whereupon the hammer was yanked out of his face. We found splatter and bone on the walls approximately ten to sixteen inches from the floor, so he was likely supine when it was removed. Some spatter arced onto the ceiling as it was wrenched away.” Charlie shuddered. “Sorry, hammers freak me out.”

“You’re not alone.”

“Nonetheless.” He shuddered again. “At some point, Assailant Number Two tried to come to the rescue. Residue puts him at approximately six feet outside the bedroom when he fired three shots from a Smith and Wesson five-shot revolver. He ended up shooting his buddy instead. I’m not certain how that happened, but Assailant One was standing with his back to the door when he was shot. Obviously, he fell to the floor shortly after. Then somehow the second assailant fell, and Adams went at him.”

“The second assailant fell before she hit him?”

“Fell to his knees,” Charlie clarified. “Sorry. We found knee and hand prints in the blood where he fell to the floor. This was when Detective Adams likely hit him in the head with the butt of the shotgun. We’ve got blood and hair on the gun, and the spatter on the wall and bed, which is approximately thirty-two inches from the floor, backs up a baseball swing. We took the dislodged teeth for evidence, so at least the mother won’t have to see them.” He glanced at Nell again. She was off the phone now, digging around in the back of the truck for her bags of cleaning supplies.

Sara asked, "What happened after the second shooter was taken out?"

"The neighbors arrived." Charlie nodded up the road. "There are two officers on the block as well as a paramedic and a fireman. Sorry, firewoman. They got Jared's heart pumping again. Fortunately for me, the on-duty officers who responded to the 911 call stayed out of the bedroom. The scene was fairly pristine when I arrived."

Sara asked, "You said Jared's heart stopped?" That would explain why they'd taken him to the closest hospital instead of the trauma center.

"Correct," Charlie answered. "As I understand it, the neighbors worked on the victim for quite a while before the ambulance arrived. I'm surprised he made it, if you want to know the truth. He lost a significant amount of blood. My estimate—and don't quote me on this until I do the math—is maybe two liters."

Sara let the information settle. If Charlie was right, Jared had suffered a Class III hemorrhage, losing thirty to forty percent of his blood volume. The cascade of respiratory distress and organ failure were second and third only to severe tachycardia. If not for his neighbors physically pumping Jared's heart, Sara would've met Nell at the funeral home this morning instead of the hospital.

And that didn't even take into account the severity of the wounds that had caused the bleeding in the first place.

"Hello," Nell said. Plastic shopping bag handles cut into her hands, but she shook her head when Sara offered to take some. She told Charlie, "I'm Darnell Long, Jared's mama."

"Charlie Reed," he answered. "I work for the state. I'm so sorry about your son, Mrs. Long. I know he's in capable hands."

"The Lord never puts more on us than we can bear."

Charlie clasped his hands together. " 'He who follows Me shall never walk in darkness.' "

Nell seemed surprised to hear the man quoting from the Bible. Sara felt the same. Charlie had never struck her as a churchgoer. Then again, he was born in the South, where babies drank Scripture with their mother's milk.

"I should get back to work." Charlie's smile said he was pleased with their reactions. "If you'll excuse me, ladies." He headed back to his van.

“Well,” Nell said, watching Charlie leave. Sara was beginning to understand that there was a certain amount of judgment in the word, which Nell had first uttered when she’d seen the packed parking lot of the strip club beside the dollar store.

She asked Sara, “What’s with that mustache?”

“Charlie’s one of the top forensics experts in the state. And very nice. He cares about what he does.”

“Well.” Nell didn’t say anything else. She headed up the driveway. The bags were heavy. Sara could see the crisscross of the handles cutting off the circulation to her fingers.

She asked, “Are you sure you don’t want me to help with those?”

“I’ve got it, thank you.” Still, Nell grunted as she made her way up the last part of the driveway.

Jared’s police bike was parked in front of the garage. The floodlight above the door was still on. Sara looked back at the street. There was no mistaking that a police officer lived here. Even in the dark of night, the light would’ve put the bike on display.

Nell asked, “What do we do about this?” Police tape was draped across the door, but Charlie had yet to seal the house.

“They’ve got more,” Sara told her, pulling the tape down. She didn’t open the door yet. “Nell, I need to tell you again that this is a bad idea. It’s going to be so much worse than you’re thinking.

There was a violent fight. Jared lost a lot of blood. It’ll be on the floor, on the walls, on every surface. It’s a biohazard. Medical waste has to be properly disposed of. You really need to leave this to the professionals.”

Nell hefted the bags. “I think I know how to clean up a mess.”

“I can let you borrow the money. Or give it to you. I don’t care which—”

“No,” Nell said, her tone making it clear that she was finished discussing the matter. “Thank you.”

She stood waiting. Finally, Sara turned the knob, pushed open the door.

There was a distinctive odor that could be found at all crime scenes—not the metallic scent of blood that came from the oxidation of iron, but the stench of fear. Sara had always been a firm believer in intuition. There was a baser part of the human brain that cued every living being to danger. That part became fully engaged the minute Sara walked through the front door of Lena and Jared's home.

A man had died here. Two men had almost been killed. A woman had fought for her life. The threat of violence lingered in the stale air.

Sara watched Nell take it all in. Her posture changed. She nearly dropped some of the bags. Sara suggested, "Why don't you sit down?"

"I'm all right."

"Let's sit down."

Nell shook her head. She looked around the front room of the house. The floor plan was open, with a combined family room and kitchen. Sunlight streamed in through the windows. The ceiling fan over the couch gave a soft whine as the blades moved. Nothing bad had happened in this space. The furniture was not overturned. The walls were a muted light gray. The only area in disarray was the kitchen, which was obviously being remodeled. Flat packs of unassembled cabinets were stacked in a neat pile. The kitchen sink was a bucket resting on an old washstand. The dishwasher was in the corner, the cord and drain hose wrapped around it like a bow. The stove was pulled away from the wall, but Sara could see the gas line was still attached.

Without thinking, she said, "He's just as bad as Jeffrey."

Jeffrey always had to have some sort of project going. Restoring an old car. Adding a second sink in the bathroom. Redoing his kitchen. Fixing things gave him a sense of accomplishment, if not completion. When he was dating Sara, a thick plastic sheet served as the outside wall to his kitchen. The refrigerator was in the dining room. A garden hose ran through the front window and attached through various valves to the ice maker.

Nell said, "Jeffrey always liked working with his hands." She set the bags down on the countertop, which was a piece of plywood on some two-by-fours. She ran her finger along the wood. Her eyes traveled to the sink bucket, the bare but cleanly swept floor. "I guess I can't fault her housekeeping. There's no way Jared cleaned up like this."

Sara didn't answer. Lena had always been neat. Her desk at the station looked like something out of an office supply catalogue.

"I'll get his daddy in here to finish this up." Nell nodded toward the stacked boxes. "Possum'll get those assembled in a day. I'll help him hang the top cabinets. He can do the bottom on his own. I don't guess they have a countertop, but we'll pick something out that—" She stopped talking. Sara followed her gaze to the couch. There was a pillow with a sheet neatly folded on the top. On the coffee table beside the remote were a pair of glasses, a glass of water, and a plastic case for a retainer.

"Hello?" Faith Mitchell walked through the open front door. She'd already met Nell and Possum at the hospital. Sara had made the introductions.

Faith asked, "You just get here?"

"Yes, ma'am." Nell wouldn't take her eyes off the couch. Faith seemed to note the arrangement, but made no comment. She smiled at Sara in a way that let her know there was enough discomfort to go around.

Sara said, "We saw Charlie."

"He's still packing up the van."

Nell noisily started unpacking the bags, banging the bottle of bleach and box of gloves down on the plywood counter.

Faith walked around the front room, picking up items, obviously trying to get a feel for the place. Will's partner was one year his junior, but she'd come up through the Atlanta police force before joining the GBI and was equal parts pragmatic and cynical. Sara could not have wished for a better agent to back up Will. Faith was clever and competent. She hated taking risks. In other words, she was the complete opposite of Lena Adams.

She was also nosy as hell. She walked around the room with a judgmental air, taking in the curtains and furnishings with the same sharp eye as Nell.

Sara felt slow on the uptake. Nell wasn't just here to clean. Lena was pushing her out of Jared's hospital room, so Nell was invading Lena's home.

Nell had finished unpacking the bags. She braced her hands on the wooden counter. "I should probably look at it first."

There was no use arguing with her. Nell was obviously determined to keep moving forward. Sara and Faith silently followed her toward the hallway.

Nell didn't get far. She stopped just outside the guest bathroom. The shower curtain was pulled back. A dirty sliver of soap was beside a bottle of Axe shampoo. The seat was up on the toilet. The counter was cluttered with men's toiletries—deodorant, a razor and shaving cream, a toothbrush that needed replacing and a half-empty tube of toothpaste. Little hairs filled the sink where Jared had shaved and failed to wash out the bowl.

Nell continued down the hall, mumbling, "I guess she kicked him out of the bathroom, too."

Faith mumbled in an equally low voice, "You couldn't pay me to share my bathroom with a man."

"Amen," Sara answered as she trailed Nell down the hallway. She stepped over a white chalk outline on the floor where Charlie had taken some DNA. Sara guessed from the look of it that someone had spat in the hall, probably to make a point.

Which further supported the idea that the shooters hadn't randomly chosen their victims.

There was a spare bedroom on either side of the hall. The first one was being used as an office. The second appeared to be another unfinished project. The walls were a cheery yellow. The closet door was propped up on two sawhorses. Nell shook her head as she passed by, probably adding it to the list of Possum's chores. She stopped a few feet from the master bedroom.

Sara heard Nell draw in a sharp breath. The woman's hands shook as she grabbed the doorframe.

Charlie's estimate may have been too conservative. Despite the passage of time, the pool of blood where Jared had fallen was still congealing. Light glimmered on the wet surface. The edges had curled into a dark rust that seeped into the hardwood floor.

The rest of the blood had dried hours ago, leaving burgundy stains that told the story of violent altercation. The ceiling and walls weren't the worst of it. Large boot prints mixed with Lena's bare footprints back and forth across the floor. Splatter. Spatter. Spray. Drops. Knee prints. Handprints. Smears where an area rug must've gotten bunched up beneath Jared's body. Tracks that showed where someone had crawled toward the bed. Still more shoe prints indicated where the neighbors and first responders rushed in to work on Jared. They must have all been covered in blood by the time they left. Long trails of red even managed to seep into the grout lines in the bathroom floor.

But the area around the door to the bedroom told the real story. This was where Jared had been shot. This was where Lena had first taken on the intruders. The dried blood splattering and spattering the walls and ceiling could fill a forensic textbook. They varied in size and shape, in coverage and scope, and would help map out every second of what had obviously been an extremely violent struggle. Even with the pieces of tooth and bone gone, the hammer and weapons taken into evidence, the shadow of death lurked in every corner.

Nell's voice caught. "I can't ... I don't know what ..."

Sara didn't say anything.

Nell sniffed, but no tears came. "Do you think a wet-vac would ..." Her voice trailed off again. Her grip tightened on the splintered wood around the door.

Sara looked at Faith, who just shook her head.

"All right." Nell thrust herself into the room. She picked her way toward the dresser. Though she was careful, there was no way to avoid the carnage. Her sneakers walked across dried footprints. Boot prints. Shoe prints. Handprints.

Her voice came out at a higher pitch. "Jared's always been more comfortable in his pajamas." She started opening drawers, which had presumably been photographed and inventoried by Charlie's team. "No self-respecting man sits around in a hospital gown. I know he'll want to put on something normal as soon as possible."

Sara stood outside the door with Faith. They both silently watched the woman riffle Lena and Jared's private things. The top three drawers obviously belonged to Lena. Her underthings were mostly utilitarian, though Nell managed to make a huffing sound when she found something that crossed the line. The bottom drawers belonged to Jared. They were filled with basketball shorts, T-shirts, and boxers. He wore a uniform eighty percent of his day. He probably had one suit in the closet for weddings and funerals and a couple of polos and khakis for less formal occasions.

Nell stopped her search. She rested her hands on her hips as she looked around the room. "I know he hasn't stopped wearing pajamas."

Sara kept her mouth shut right up until Nell made her way to the bedside table. "Nell."

She looked up, but kept her hand on the drawer pull.

"That's probably Lena's." Sara indicated the flattened book, which was clearly a romance novel, beside the hand lotion and tube of lip balm.

When Nell didn't move, Faith said, "You probably don't want to know what your son's wife keeps in her bedside table." She added, "Or your son, for that matter."

"What on earth does that—"

She was cut off by the sound of motorcycle engines. Sara turned around. The front door was wide open. She saw at least six motormen in the street. If Sara knew cops, they'd come here to look after Jared's mother. And just in time, too.

Faith seized on the opportunity, suggesting to Nell, "Why don't you go talk to Jared's friends? I'm sure they want to know how he's doing."

"I don't have time to be everybody's mama," Nell grumbled, but she stomped out of the room anyway.

"Man." Faith waited until Nell was out of earshot. "That woman has a razor for a mouth."

Sara kept her own counsel. "Did you talk to Charlie?"

"He briefed me earlier." Faith looked back at the bedroom. "Nell's gonna get a call in a few minutes from the hospital. Jared's fever is up."

"He has an infection?"

"That's what the nurse said."

Nurses were seldom wrong about these things. Sara thought of Nell's steely determination, all the plans she'd made in the last few hours for when Jared finally woke up. "I don't think she'll make it if he dies."

"It's always the strong ones who break the hardest."

Sara tucked her chin to her chest.

Faith entered the room, walking across the dried blood with a cop's impunity. "I guess I should look for those pajamas. Maybe that'll make her feel like she's helping him."

"Maybe." Sara leaned against the doorjamb as Faith searched the closet. She stared at the footprints scattered across the floor. The blood was so dry that it had skeletonized, but Charlie had been careful. Sara could still track the progress. It helped that Lena had such small feet. Sara always forgot how petite she was, barely five-four and probably one-ten on a heavy day.

Charlie Reed had said that four initial responders came from the neighborhood. Judging by the bloody prints on the floor, they had each waited by the bathroom door as the others took turns working on Jared. That left the two sets of boot prints to the assailants. They had both sported the cowboy variety, with flat plastic soles that left distinct exclamation points in the blood. One had a skull and crossbones carved into each heel. The other pair was an off brand with a generic set of furrows. Both of the attackers pronated, probably from riding motorcycles.

But that didn't account for all of the prints.

Sara walked over to the bed. She knelt down, asking Faith, "Two attackers, right?"

Faith's voice was muffled as she dug around the closet shelves.

"That's right."

"Four responders?"

"Uhhh ..." She drew out the word. "Yep. Two cops, an off-duty paramedic, and a chick with the fire department."

"What about this?"

Faith turned around.

Sara pointed to a shoe print right up against Jared's bedside table. This one was also from a boot, but it was larger than the other two and the heel had the distinctive logo of a Cat's Paw no-slip rubber sole.

Faith turned back to the closet. She didn't seem interested. "I'm sure Charlie got it."

"But look at the prints. Lena was barefooted. The attackers wore cowboy boots." She pointed to the other prints. "Two of the neighbors wore sneakers, the third one probably had on bedroom slippers, and the fourth one was wearing socks."

Faith pulled a couple of pairs of sweatpants off the shelf. She added a T-shirt from the dirty-clothes basket. "These can pass for pajamas, right?"

Slowly, Sara stood up. "Aren't you concerned that a third assailant might've been here last night?"

"Are you saying that I'm not doing my job?"

"No." Sara felt properly chastened. "No, of course not."

"You're forgetting the EMTs." Faith counted it off on her fingers. "Three crews, right? Jared was taken out first. The second shooter was next, the first was taken to the morgue, so that's six more guys at least, which is twelve more possibilities for prints. And God only knows who traipsed in here from Macon PD."

“Charlie told me the cops from the 911 call stayed out of the bedroom.”

“Really?” Faith didn’t sound happy, but Sara kept talking.

“He also said that the first ambulance took a while to get here. The extraneous blood would’ve been dry in five, ten minutes tops. So unless an EMT purposely stepped in the pool of blood around Jared, then walked over here, there’s no way that any of them could’ve made this third print.” Sara put a finer point on it. “Whoever left this boot print was here when the crime occurred.”

“That’s where the second assailant fell,” Faith said, her voice straining to sound reasonable. “I’m sure one of the first EMTs checked on him. Right? They wouldn’t just rush in, see one body, and leave the other two without checking on them.”

“The EMTs were most likely in 5.11 Tacticals.” Sara was familiar with the boots, which were specifically designed for paramedics and firefighters. “And even without that, the blood was obviously dry by the time they got here. You don’t see any other prints from the EMTs, do you? Not even around Jared.”

Faith gave a heavy sigh. “There was a lot going on in this room last night. There’s no telling where that print came from. All right?”

Sara nodded, but only to keep the peace. It was absolutely possible, even probable, that one of the EMTs had checked on the second assailant before leaving the house. But there was no way in hell he’d stood over the body and leaned down to do it. The EMT would be on his knees as he ran vitals. Unless he was a contortionist, there was no reason for him to wedge his foot against the bedside table.

“Look.” Faith closed the closet door. “I know you’re good at this, Sara, but this is Charlie’s scene. He’s been here practically from the minute Jared was carried out. Maybe it’s Charlie’s shoe that made the print, or one of his guys. Or maybe he’s tracked it back to an EMT who tripped or stepped where he shouldn’t’ve or whatever. Charlie will do all the rule-outs and trace it back to someone. You know the process. No stone unturned.”

“You’re right,” Sara agreed, but she had seen Faith lie enough to know what it looked like. Obviously, something else was going on.

Faith said, “Come on. Let’s see if my plan worked.” She left the room.

Sara assumed she was supposed to follow. She took one last look at the boot print before heading back up the hallway. Her medical examiner's mind wouldn't shut off just because she hadn't done the job in years. The Cat's Paw logo said a lot about the owner of the boot. He was frugal, the type of person who would resole a shoe rather than throw it out. Going by the size, he was at least six feet tall or more. He worked in a job that required a nonconducting, nonslip sole—probably a mechanic or electrician or builder. Analysis would show if there was any oil or residue transferred from the porous rubber sole. Known associates of the assailants could be narrowed down from there. Barring that, a simple phone call to the shoe repair stores in the area could easily generate a list of customers who'd purchased Cat's Paw soles.

Which was probably what someone on Charlie's team was doing right now.

Faith was right. Charlie was very good at his job. So was Faith, for that matter. If they were hiding something, it was probably for a good reason. As much as Sara felt otherwise, she had to keep reminding herself that she was firmly on the outside looking in.

Faith stood at the open front door. In the street, the motormen had surrounded Nell in a protective huddle. They all seemed relaxed and talkative. Sara was sure they were telling Nell stories of Jared's many exploits. Whether or not they were true didn't matter. There was no better liar than a cop spinning a yarn.

"I'm shocked they listened to me," Faith admitted. "I told them to take up donations for the cleaning service. I figured even old Razor Mouth wouldn't be rude enough to say no."

Sara laughed despite herself. "That's pretty smart."

"One of Amanda's tricks—but don't tell her I'm using it. People think they're gonna be judged if they hire someone else to clean up their mess. I think it's a southern thing." She walked back to the kitchen. "I'll see if I can get them to pitch in and finish the kitchen, too. Jesus, I woulda killed him myself if I had to wash dishes out of a bucket."

"It's not as bad as it looks," Sara pointed out. The bucket had a hole in the bottom that led to the drain. A garden hose was threaded to the faucet to extend the reach. It was exactly the kind of thing that Jeffrey would've done—completely rigged yet unquestionably functional.

By contrast, Will would've been horrified by the contraption. He shared a lot of qualities with Jeffrey, but he would not rest until a project was not just finished, but finished right. Or at least the way he felt was right. It drove Will crazy that the builder who'd worked on Sara's apartment hadn't painted the top edges of all the doors.

"Do me a favor?" Faith was rummaging through the stack of mail on the kitchen table. "Check to see if Nell's still outside."

Sara stood on the tips of her toes to see down the hill. Nell was still talking to the cops. "Yes. Why?"

Faith ripped open one of the envelopes.

"Isn't that illegal?"

"Only if I get caught." Her eyes skimmed what looked like an invoice. "Jared opened it, right? Only he can't remember because of his head injury."

"That's inviting some bad karma."

"And it wasn't even worth it." Faith folded the invoice. "You'll be pleased to know that Lena's Pap smear was normal." She tucked the paper back into the envelope. "I should go tell Nell about Jared. The doctor should've called by now."

"Wait." Sara said, "I know it's not likely to come up, but Nell doesn't know about Will. I mean, me and Will. Together." She felt her heart start to jump, like she was telling a fib to her mother. "I'd like to keep it that way."

If Faith was surprised, she didn't show it. "Okay. I won't say anything."

Sara felt compelled to give an explanation. "It's just that Will's still legally married and ..." She let her voice trail off. There was no reason to lie. "They just loved Jeffrey so much. They wouldn't understand how I was able to move on." Sara paused. "Sometimes, I wonder how I did it myself."

"I'm glad you did." Faith leaned against the table. "Will loves you, you know? I mean, crazy love. He was never this way with Angie. From the day he met you, his feet stopped touching the ground."

Sara smiled, though the last thing she wanted to think about right now was Will's elusive wife.

Faith said, "Seriously, I've never seen him like this before. You've changed him. You've made him—" She shrugged, as if she couldn't quite believe it. "Happy."

Unreasonably, Sara felt tears well into her eyes. "He's made me happy, too."

"Then that's all that matters." Faith wriggled her eyebrows. " 'This, too, shall pass.' "

Sara wiped her eyes. "There's been an alarming number of people quoting Bible verses at me today."

"My mother got my name from the Bible. I'm supposed to be the substance of things hoped for. Talk about wishful thinking." Faith pushed away from the table. "I really should get Nell. How bad is an infection at this stage?"

"They'll probably bring in somebody from the CDC." The Centers for Disease Control had a dedicated team serving the Atlanta area. "It's good that we're close."

"That doesn't sound cheerful."

"No," Sara admitted. "Infections are unpredictable. People respond differently to treatment. No two patients have the same outcome. If the infection is somewhere like his heart or his brain, then the odds are low he'll survive, and even then, it's a tough recovery." She felt the need to add, "But he's young and otherwise healthy. That counts for a lot."

"Shit, here she comes." Faith waited for Nell to make her way up the porch steps. She had a FedEx padded mailer in one hand and a small envelope in the other.

"I guess you'll get your wish." Nell tucked the envelope into her back pocket. "They say they take up a collection when stuff like this happens. I didn't want to be rude, but it's not like I'm an invalid." Her words were hard, but Sara could see the relief on Nell's face. The deep lines had smoothed from her forehead. Some of the tension was gone from her jaw. "They're nice boys. I shouldn't complain."

Faith said, "They feel as helpless as you do, Mrs. Long. Doing something for you, even something that you're capable of doing on your own, makes them feel better."

"I suppose," Nell admitted. She held up the FedEx mailer. The word PERSONAL was written across the back in red marker. "The delivery guy dropped this off while we were in the street. It's addressed to Lena. Says it's personal. I didn't know if I should open it or not."

"Is there a return address?" Faith sounded disinterested, though

Sara knew better.

Nell squinted at the label. "It's all smeared. Should I open it?"

Faith's shrug was almost believable. "If you want. It might be something Lena needs."

Nell guffawed. "They say the same thing here as in Alabama—you can piss on my face, but don't tell me it's raining?"

Faith's smile showed her teeth.

"That's what I thought." Nell went to the kitchen and retrieved her purse from the counter. Sara wasn't surprised when she pulled out a large utility knife, but Faith obviously was. Her eyebrows shot straight up.

"Let's see what personal thing we got here." Nell sliced open the top of the padded mailer. She peered inside the envelope, her eyes narrowed as if she wasn't quite sure what she was seeing.

Sara asked, "What is it?"

Nell reached into the package. "I don't—"

The mailer dropped to the floor.

Nell held up a tiny jacket, the sort of thing you'd buy for a baby. It was dark blue with orange piping down the sleeves and an Auburn University logo across the back.

Her lips parted in surprise. She looked at Sara, then Faith, then down at the little jacket again. She cupped the hoodie sewn into the back of the collar.

Wordlessly, Nell ran into the hallway, her shoulder catching the corner. Sara was close on her heels as Nell entered the spare bedroom.

"He didn't—" Nell's voice caught. She stood in the middle of the room, the jacket gripped tightly in her hands. "How could he not—" A strangled cry came out of her mouth. She buried her face in the small jacket. "Oh, God."

Faith came up behind Sara. Her mouth was set. Guilt virtually radiated off her skin.

"This is a nursery," Nell whispered, clutching the jacket to her chest. "He was working on a nursery." Her fingers traced the back of the closet door. The outline of several balloons had been drawn with a pencil. Cans of brightly colored paint were on the floor. There were art brushes and sponges and trays to hold the paint.

Nell stared at Faith. Her tone was deadly sharp. "You knew."

Faith didn't bother to lie this time.

A phone started ringing. Nell checked her pocket for her cell phone. Her voice shook as she answered, "Possum, what is it? I'm busy now." She listened, nodding a few times before she closed the phone and put it back in her pocket. "Jared's got an infection." Her tone was matter-of-fact. "They say I need to get back up there."

"I'll drive you," Sara offered.

"No." Nell held the baby's jacket against her chest. "I need some time alone, all right? Can you drive her back?" She was talking to Faith. "I just need some time, okay?"

Nell didn't wait for an answer. She left the room. All the air seemed to go with her.

Faith let out a long sigh. "That was awful."

Sara said nothing.

Faith studied her carefully. "Sara?"

Sara shook her head as she took in the nursery, the way the light from the windows fell across the floor. The yellow walls were cheery and warm. She could imagine sheers hanging in the windows, a summer breeze rustling the edges. Balloons would be painted around the walls to match the closet door. The jacket would hang on a tiny plastic hanger—something colorful to match the décor. The hoodie wasn't sized for a newborn, but at three to six months, Lena's baby would be big enough to wear it. Faith said, "I'm sorry I didn't tell you."

Sara could only keep shaking her head. She didn't trust herself to speak.

One of the last things that Sara and Jeffrey had planned together was adopting a baby. Sara couldn't have children of her own. It had taken years for her and Jeffrey to be in the same place about adoption, to decide that they were ready to raise a child together.

Then Jeffrey had died, and Sara had come completely undone. The adoption agency returned their application. At the time, Sara barely registered the rejection. She'd been incapable of taking care of herself, let alone a baby.

"Sara?" Faith asked. "Will you please say something?"

Acid filled Sara's mouth.

It wasn't fair.

That's what Sara wanted to say. To scream at the top of her lungs.

It just wasn't fair.

Lena wasn't strong. She would bend, not break. She would recover from this tragedy the same easy way she recovered from every other tragedy before.

Even if she lost Jared, Lena would always know what it felt like to have his child growing inside of her. She could always hold her baby's hand and think of holding Jared's. She could see her child laugh and learn and grow and play sports and do school projects and graduate from college and Lena would always, always remember her husband. She would see Jared in her grandchildren and great-grandchildren. On her deathbed, she would find peace in the knowledge that they had made something beautiful together. That even in death, they would both go on living.

"Sara," Faith said. "What's happening here?"

Sara wiped her eyes, angry that she was back in the same dark place she'd started at this morning. "Why does everything come so damn easy to her?" She struggled to speak. Her throat clenched around every word that wanted to come out of her mouth. "Everything just opens up, and she always walks through unscathed and—" Sara had to stop for breath. "It's just so easy for her. She always has it so goddamn easy."

Faith indicated the door. "Come on."

Sara couldn't move.

"Let's go." Faith took Sara by the arm and led her out of the room. Sara thought they were leaving the house, but Faith stopped at the kitchen table. She held up the envelope she'd opened before.

Sara didn't take it. "I don't care about her Pap smear."

"Look who it's from."

Sara scanned the return address. Macon Medical Center.

Driscoll Benedict, OB-GYN. "So?"

Faith opened the envelope, unfolded the doctor's invoice. She held it up for Sara to see. The treatment date was ten days ago. The amount was zeroed out with the advisory that the hospital would bill Lena separately for her emergency room visit.

Across the bottom, someone had written, "God bless you both. You are in our prayers."

Sara took the invoice from Faith. Her knees felt weak. She sat down at the table. Even without the note of condolence, she recognized the medical billing code.

Lena had lost the baby.

9.

Will rode his motorcycle down a neglected state highway, his head rotating like a gun turret. While there was the occasional eighteen-wheeler on the back roads, it was the deer he was most worried about. Less than ten minutes ago, Will had seen a buck dart right out in front of him. The creature was magnificent. There was no other word for it. Muscles rippled along his chest and back. His spindly legs were like a ballerina's. His antlers were branched like a tree. The animal hadn't even bothered to look Will's way, which was good because Will would've been humiliated if any living creature had seen the look of sheer terror on his face. He did not need a mathematician to calculate the odds of survival when a speeding motorcycle slammed into a speeding deer. The coroner would've spent the rest of his days picking pieces of Will out of the buck's rib cage.

He supposed there were all sorts of wild animals living close to Atlanta, but the possibility seemed remote when you stood amidst the skyscrapers, watching buses and cars and trains zoom by.

One of the most startling things Will had found in Macon was not the wildlife, but the divide between rich and poor. In Atlanta, Will's modest house was only a few blocks from Sara's penthouse apartment, which in turn was not far from a methadone clinic.

Macon didn't really have a literal wrong side of the tracks, but a meandering avenue skirting the city limits seemed to be the point at which the carpet ran out. Old mansions gave way to cottages, which gave onto clapboard houses and derelict trailer parks and, eventually, unpainted shacks. Working cases around the state, Will had seen his share of poverty, but there was something particularly depressing about fresh laundry hanging outside a structure that looked as if it didn't even have running water.

Will slowed the bike. He squinted up the road, checking for loose deer. Closer proximity revealed a yellow Volkswagen Bug—not the new kind that looked like something George Jetson would drive, but the older model that emitted a sound like a child blowing a raspberry. There were bumper stickers all over the back. The blinkers were flashing in lieu of brake lights. Will downshifted another gear. The Bug swung into the oncoming traffic lane, doing a sharp U-turn toward a row of mailboxes on a strip of dirt. A hand went out, a mailbox was checked, then the Bug swung another heavy U-turn that would've provided a nice ramp for Will's bike if he hadn't been paying attention.

He shifted the gear down another notch and pulled over opposite the mailboxes. He checked the time on his cell phone. Will had given himself almost an hour to make what was supposed to be a twenty-minute journey. He wasn't good with directions, and a phone that told you to go left or right was not exactly helpful to the average dyslexic. Also, he felt mired in a quicksand of guilt. Sara wasn't happy with him being undercover. She sure as hell wouldn't be happy with the prospect of Will going on a date. Not that he was technically dating Cayla Martin, but the fact that the nurse seemed to think so gave the exercise an air of uncomfortable legitimacy.

After talking with Faith, Will had decided that it was time to confront the Big Whitey of it all. He'd spent nearly an hour looking for Tony Dell. Cayla Martin seemed like a good fallback plan. The nurse was much easier—in more ways than one. Will was eating his lunch in the cafeteria when a furtive hand slid a note under his tray. The move was practiced. No one seemed to notice. Will wanted to believe he rose to the occasion, discreetly tucking the note into his pocket like Aldrich Ames. Though Will was pretty sure the master spy hadn't read his missives while hiding in a toilet stall.

7 p.m.—Left off exit 12, right on dirt road. Only house with lights on.
Don't be late!!

Cayla had put a smiley face under the exclamation points, which served to heighten Will's guilt. He left smiley faces for Sara sometimes. He texted them to her. She texted them back. Once, when they were fooling around, she kissed them all over his stomach.

Will let out a long, pained sigh as he got off the bike.

He pulled up the telephone keypad on his iPhone. He dialed in the twelve-digit code to access the secret apps. The screen flashed up quickly, so he had his finger ready to select the number-cloaking program. The app opened. He dialed in a ten-digit number.

The edge of the phone bumped his helmet. Will undid the strap and hooked it on the handlebars. Four unusually long rings passed before Sara answered. In the background, Will heard a piano playing and the soft murmur of conversation.

Instead of saying hello, Sara asked, "Brunswick?"

Will guessed the cloaking app had done its job. "Not exactly." He tried to identify the background noise, which sounded more like a bar than a hospital. "Where are you?"

"Where am I?" Her drawl was more pronounced, which tended to happen when she got away from the city. "I am drinking a glass of scotch at the hotel bar of the Macon Days Inn."

Will immediately thought of all the scumbags who were probably trying to hit on her. He worked to keep his cool. "Yeah?"

"Yep." She hit the p hard at the end. Will thought about the shape of her mouth. The bowtie of her lips. And then he imagined some idiot in a gold necklace sidling up to her and asking if she wanted a refill.

He said, "That's not like you to be in a bar."

"No," Sara agreed. "But I'm doing a lot of things today that aren't like me."

Will couldn't decipher her tone. She didn't sound drunk, which was a relief. He'd never known Sara to be a drinker.

He offered, "I could probably get there around midnight, one at the latest."

"No, sweetheart. I don't want you anywhere near here."

Will felt a jolt of fear. Sara usually called him sweetheart when he was being dense. Had she figured out he was in Macon? Will ran through the possibilities, trying to find an area of weakness. Faith wouldn't tell—at least not without giving Will a warning. Denise Branson knew better, and even if she didn't, she had no idea who Sara was. Lena had promised to keep quiet, but what kind of idiot trusted a woman who killed a man with a hammer, then lied about what came next?

"Will?"

He swallowed back his paranoia. One thing he knew about Sara was that she didn't play games. If his cover was blown, she'd be demanding an explanation, not listening to piano music in a bar.

He asked, "How's Jared doing?"

"Not good." She paused to take a drink. Will heard the glass hit the bar when she finished. "One of his surgical incisions turned septic. He went into shock. They've got a guy from the CDC running the case. He knows what he's doing, but—" She stopped. "Lena was pregnant. She lost the baby ten days ago."

He still couldn't decipher the edge in her tone. Sara couldn't have children, but that didn't have anything to do with Lena. Will asked, "Does Faith know?"

"She was there. I basically lost my shit in front of her."

Will looked at his bike. He should turn around right now and go see her. The Days Inn was just off the interstate, less than half an hour away.

Sara said, "Faith was very nice about it. I guess if you're going to lose your shit, she's a good person to do it around."

"Yeah." Will heard a semi barreling down the road, the lights slicing through the dusk. The noise of the engine vibrated the air, cut out whatever Sara was saying.

He asked, "What?"

"Doesn't matter." He heard the tinkle of ice cubes, her throat work as she swallowed. "Are you sitting on the side of the road?"

"I wanted to check on you. You were pretty upset this morning."

"Well, I'm pretty upset tonight," she quipped. "You know, my daddy told me a long time ago that wanting revenge is like sipping poison and waiting for the other person to die."

"Is that what you're doing?"

"I don't know." She paused again. "I feel like I've trespassed. Like I've stolen something from Lena. Something private that didn't belong to me." She gave a harsh laugh. "My pound of flesh isn't nearly as filling as I thought it'd be."

Will stared at the mailboxes. Numbers had been spray-painted on the doors in various colors by different hands. Someone had drawn a daisy on one box. Another had the Georgia Bulldogs logo.

Sara said, "I miss you."

Will had seen her less than twelve hours ago, but hearing the words made him realize that he ached for her. He tried to think of a way out of this mess. He should tell her that he was sorry for keeping secrets. That he was sorry he wasn't there right now. That he was a coward and a liar and he didn't deserve Sara but he was pretty sure he would fade away to nothing without her.

"Anyway." Abruptly, her tone changed. "Since one scotch is clearly my limit, I should go back to the hospital and sit with Nell. I told her that Lena lost the baby. She already knew. I guess Lena told her. I don't know. She's not talking much. Of course, neither am I—at least not to Nell." Sara gave a stilted laugh. "I'm sorry I'm rambling. I'm just tired. I've been up since this time yesterday. I tried to sleep, but I couldn't."

"Are you going home tonight?" Will started to make plans. He'd finish with Cayla, then jump on his bike and head straight to Atlanta.

Sara quashed the idea. "I already booked a room for the night. The dogs will be fine, and I shouldn't be driving long distances right now."

"I could come get you." He tried not to beg. "Let me come get you."

"No." There was no equivocation in her voice. "I don't want you here, Will. I want you separate from this."

He felt trapped by his own lies. "I'm so sorry."

"I don't want you to be sorry." She paused again as if she needed to catch her breath. "I want you to keep doing whatever you're doing, wherever you're doing it, and then when it's over I want you to come back home to me and for us to have dinner and talk and laugh and then I want you to take me into the bedroom and—"

Another truck roared by, but Will heard every single pornographic detail she whispered into the phone. Sara asked, "Can you do that?"

Will's tongue felt too thick for his mouth. He cleared his throat. "I can do all of that."

"Good, because that's what I need, Will. I need you to make me feel like I'm firmly planted in my life again. The life I have with you."

The piano music had stopped. Ice hit a glass.

Someone laughed. She said, "What we have is good, right?"

"Yes." At least on that point, he could give her a straight answer. "It's really good."

"That's what I think, too."

“Sara—” Will heard the desperation in his voice, but he couldn’t think of anything to say but her name.

“I need to go.”

“You don’t have to.”

“Just think about later, all right? Us at home, and what you want to eat for dinner, or maybe we’ll go to a movie, or walk the dogs. Just live our lives. That’s what I’m thinking about right now. That’s what’s getting me through this.”

“We’ll do it. We’ll do all of it.” He waited for her to say something else, but she ended the call.

Will stared down at the phone as if he could make Sara get back on the line. Not that he had any words of great comfort. If anything, Will had been too quiet on the call. He realized that now. He’d forced Sara to do most of the talking when it was obvious that she was waiting for Will to say something—anything—that would somehow bring her some peace.

He mumbled, “Idiot.”

Will dialed the twelve-digit code again to access the app. He wasn’t fast enough when the screen popped up. Will dialed the code again, but he stopped shy of the last two numbers.

He didn’t know what to say to her. He wanted to go to her. He could be there in ten minutes if he blew through all the red lights. He would do everything she wanted him to and more.

And then she would ask him how he’d gotten there so fast.

Will had ten minutes to figure out how to tell her. Fifteen if traffic near the Days Inn was bad. He unhooked his helmet from the handlebars. A chunk of paint had been scraped off. He strapped the shorty on his head. Once he was on the bike, he turned the front wheel back the way he’d come.

He didn’t have a choice anymore. The only thing to do after that call was go straight to the hotel, or the hospital, and sit down with Sara and tell her exactly what was going on. Faith was right—this was too close to the bone. What had started out as a small lie of omission had built up into a giant deceit that could take out their entire relationship.

Will wasn’t going to have Sara drinking poison for him one day.

He gunned the bike as he headed back toward the interstate. He looked up at the darkening sky. The hotel was near an airport, so he could use the planes to make sure he was heading in the right direction. At least Will assumed that was the Days Inn Sara was talking about. The chain was big. There was probably more than one location in Macon.

He just happened to glance back down in time to notice a black pickup truck parked in the middle of the road. The oncoming lane was blocked by a white Honda. Will slowed the bike, wishing he had a horn. There was no way to pass on either side of the road—at least not without risking a slide down an embankment. Will let his boots scrape the ground as he stopped the bike.

“Hey!” Will shouted. “Get out of the way!”

“Hold your horses!” The pickup driver craned half his body out of the cab. Will recognized Tony’s voice before he saw his face. “Damn, Bud, what’re you doin’ comin’ from that way? Cayla’s is down there.”

He was pointing to a dirt road shooting off at a steep angle. Tall trees obscured the entrance. There was no sign, no marker to indicate that this was anything but a dirt track. Will would’ve never been able to find it, and Cayla had played this game well enough to know she was better off giving a man an address he had to locate rather than a phone number he could use to cancel.

“Come on.” Tony waved for Will to follow him.

Will revved the bike, pretending he wasn’t checking out the driver in the white Honda. He saw the top of a head, dark wavy hair and a high forehead, as the window snicked up.

Tony turned onto the dirt road. His radio was loud enough for the melody to make its way back to Will. Lynyrd Skynyrd. “Free Bird.” Not much of a surprise.

Will hung back from the truck, which kicked up enough red dust to suffocate an elephant. There was no way to get out of this now. Will would spend two hours at Cayla’s, tops, then find Sara and do what he should’ve done in the first place.

She was probably on her way to the hospital. Will couldn’t very well ambush her in front of her friends, and besides, what he needed to say to her should be said when they were alone. He would tell her at the hotel. They’d never been in a real fight before. He couldn’t guess what Sara would do. Maybe she would throw things or cuss him like a dog. Then again, he’d never seen her throw anything out of anger and she seldom cursed, a by-product of working around children all day.

Maybe she would get really quiet, which she did when she was worried. Will hated when she got quiet. Though that might be better than the alternative. All he knew for certain was that he'd pretty much lie down in front of a speeding train to keep her from leaving him.

The back wheels of Tony's truck spun as he dipped into a rut. Will steered the bike away from the pothole, which was filled with muddy water. The dirt road thinned to a single lane. Will tried to take in his surroundings, but he could only see the outlines of a few houses. Day was completely giving over to night. Tony was too far ahead for his headlights to do Will any good. The man drove with his foot on the brake. The taillights turned the red road an icy black.

Will wondered if Tony was leading him to the middle of nowhere to kill him. The man didn't seem capable of murder, but Will had been surprised before. Death generally didn't announce itself. He'd bet the forty-three-year-old entrepreneur who died on the toilet last week wasn't planning on being found with his pants down.

A small lighted sign announced the entrance to a trailer park. Palm trees surrounded the flowing script announcing the compound's name. The place was well tended, obviously catering to families. Children's bicycles were stacked neatly in front of porches. All the trashcans had been collected from the road. Cars were parked evenly in their spaces. He could see the soft glow of televisions behind drawn curtains.

The road doubled up again as the trailer park disappeared in Will's side mirror. He squinted up ahead. Tony's hand was raised in the air. He was snapping his fingers to the music. George Michael's "I Want Your Sex." A song like that could get a man killed this far from civilization, but Will guessed Tony didn't care.

Suddenly, the dirt road gave onto a paved street. The bike kicked up. Luckily, Will wasn't going fast, otherwise he would've taken a vault over the handlebars.

Streetlights illuminated every inch of the paved surface. Foundations had been poured for hundreds of houses, but the builder had either run out of money or run out of town. Probably both. Plumbing pipes and drains stuck up from the poured slabs like toothpicks. Incongruously, some of the driveways had mailboxes but no houses. Others had weeds breaking through the white concrete sidewalks.

Cayla Martin's was one of four completed houses at the end of a cul-de-sac. Macon wasn't the only city in America that had its share of abandoned subdivisions, but Cayla's had a particular sadness about it. The lawn was overgrown with weeds. The one sad tree by the front door was bent and dying. No one had cared about this house from the very beginning. The trim paint was peeling where the wood had not been primed. Some of the windows had been installed crookedly. Even the front door had a strange tilt like no one had bothered to plumb it in. Will wondered if the builder was related to the lazy jackass who'd worked on Sara's apartment.

Tony Dell pulled into a short driveway, parking the truck behind a black Toyota. The door opened. Tony practically fell out of the truck. The F-250 was too big for him, like a kid clomping around in his daddy's shoes. Tony had the same jaunty gait as he approached Will in the semidarkness. "Damn, Bud, ain't your balls freezin' on that thing?"

Will shrugged, though the man was right about the cold. He nodded toward the truck. "Where'd you get that?"

"Borrowed it from a friend."

"Nice friend," Will noted. The truck was a considerable step up from Tony's impounded Kia.

"Hope you weren't plannin' nothin' romantic tonight." Tony tucked his hands into his pockets as he walked toward the house. "I kinda invited myself over. Cayla's gotta faucet been leakin' for a while, so I said I'd come by and fix it."

"She knows you're going to be here?"

"Sure," Tony said, but his voice went up a bit higher than honesty would dictate. "You get off work early?"

"Little bit." His boss was six months from retirement and had a lady on the side. Will was about to say something derogatory about Salemi's work habits, but then Tony Dell stood under the porch light and Will was rendered speechless.

The man had gotten the shit kicked out of him. There was no better description. His nose was sideways. Both eyes were bruised. A long, open gash on his cheek had been sewn shut with thick black stitches.

Tony smiled, despite the pain it must've caused. "Cop caught up with me."

"Vickery?" Will guessed. He'd joked about it with Faith before, but now that he saw Paul Vickery's handiwork, it wasn't funny. "What the hell happened?"

"We're cool, Bud." Tony held up his hands in defense. "I didn't tell him a damn thing. I think that ol' boy just needed to give somebody a beat-down. Coulda been you. Ended up bein' me."

Will couldn't believe the man's cavalier attitude. "You gonna file a report on him?"

He practically guffawed. "Shit, that's funny, Bud. Like they work for us or somethin'." He raised his hand to knock on the door. "Act like you invited me, all right?"

"Like—"

Cayla had a huge grin on her face when she opened the door. And then she saw Tony Dell and looked like she wanted to murder him. "What're you doin' here?"

"Bud invited me." He patted Will on the back. "Didn't you, Bud?"

Will mumbled, "Yeah."

Cayla didn't seem concerned that Tony had been beaten. She sneered at him, saying, "You sneaky little prick."

"Aw, don't be like that." Tony pushed himself into the house. He had to slither under Cayla's arm to do it.

For the first time since he'd met Tony Dell, Will was glad to have the little freak around. Cayla had obviously prepared for their date. Her makeup was so heavy that it clumped in the corners of her eyes. Her jeans cut her into two separate parts and her white lace blouse clearly showed the dark purple bra underneath. Even from the porch, Will could smell her perfume. He didn't know enough about these things to guess whether the scent was cheap or not, but going by how much she used, Will hoped she got a volume discount.

Tony made a show of sniffing the air. "Damn, girl, you smell pretty."

"Shut up, Tony. I told you not to talk to me that way." She gave Will a tightly coiled smile as she motioned him inside. "He's my brother."

"Stepbrother," Tony corrected. He winked at Will. "Not by blood."

Cayla groaned as she shut the door. "His daddy married my mama when we were in junior high. Ever since then, he's been a sticky turd I can't scrape off my shoe."

Tony's laugh said he took this as a compliment.

Will grunted, not out of any Bill Black response but because he was at a complete loss for words.

"You look nice," Cayla said, though Will had specifically dressed down for the occasion. His jeans were torn at the hem. His blue Oxford shirt had been nice two years ago, but the collar was frayed. The black T-shirt he wore underneath had holes in the armpits.

"You wanna beer?" Cayla asked.

"I'm good." Will didn't drink or smoke, which presented a serious handicap as far as his con cred was concerned. "Maybe later." Tony said, "I could do with a cold one."

"Then get your scrawny ass back in that truck and go get you one," Cayla suggested. Tony grumbled a response. They certainly talked to each other like brother and sister.

Will looked around the room as he waited out the argument. The house was clean if not tidy. Cayla liked her figurines. Large dolls in fancy dresses were on almost every available surface. Some were under glass like wheels of cheese. Others were on stands that helped them hold up umbrellas or push baby carriages. Cayla had decorated everything in pastels, mostly pinks and blues. A large flat-screen television took pride of place across from a baby blue sectional sofa.

The fight was over. Or at least Tony seemed to think so. He hurdled the back of the sofa and plopped down in front of the set. "We gonna eat out here? I think the game's coming on."

"You can eat out here by your damn self." Cayla motioned for Will to follow her, telling him, "Just so you know next time, I prefer it's just me and you."

Will grunted as he trailed her into the kitchen. The house was choppy, which was strange for a new build. The wall bisecting the kitchen and family room looked taped into place. The saloon doors in the middle weren't even on the same plane. At least an inch separated the top edges, like blocks in a game of Tetris.

"We can eat in here." Cayla held open one of the saloon doors.

Will glanced around the kitchen, which was small and crowded but smelled so good he felt his stomach start to weep. Even the stench of a cigarette burning in the ashtray couldn't hide the delicious aroma of fried chicken, biscuits, and some kind of sweet cobbler.

“You hungry?”

Will nodded. His mouth was too filled with drool to answer. Sara could do a lot of things, but she could not cook to save her life.

“I told you I gotta good scald on some chicken.” Cayla took down a plate from the cabinet. There were pots warming on the stove. She picked up a spoon and started to fill the plate.

Will sat down at the table.

She asked, “You hear that cop’s not doing good?” Will didn’t answer.

“Got an infection or something. Went into septic shock.”

Will tried to keep her talking. “What’s that mean?”

“Means he’s got blood poisoning.” She took her cigarette from the ashtray as she placed the heaping plate of food in front of Will. Fried chicken, green beans, black-eyed peas, mashed potatoes and gravy, and two biscuits perilously balanced on top.

She put the cigarette to her lips and inhaled deeply. “Sepsis happens a lot with surgeries. They got all those tubes going in and out of them. Bacteria gets into the bloodstream. The heart can’t take it. Poison floods through the body, shuts it all down.”

He noticed her grammar had suddenly improved. Cayla Martin seemed to have an accent for every occasion. “Sounds bad.”

She took another long drag before stubbing out the cigarette. “Yeah, it can be. You want that beer now?”

Will nodded. “Is he going to make it?”

“The cop?” She was at the refrigerator. She looked back over her shoulder. Underneath all the makeup, Cayla Martin wasn’t unattractive. She seemed to have that weird quality that made otherwise smart men do stupid things. “He might make it. He’s young. Pretty strong. Why do you care?”

Will shrugged as he picked up his fork. “I don’t.”

The saloon doors opened. Tony eyed them suspiciously. His jealousy was like a lighthouse beacon scanning the room.

Cayla gave him a nasty look. “I thought you were watching the game.”

“I bet you did.” Tony walked into the kitchen with his hands clenched. He told Will, “I heard you were up there today. In the ICU.”

Will took a big bite of peas. The bacon grease and salt caressed his taste buds.

Tony asked, "She recognize you?" Will glanced at Cayla.

"It's all right." She popped open the beer and put the can in front of Will. "He tells me everything whether I wanna hear it or not."

"The cop," Tony pushed. He was just as changeable as his stepsister. Suddenly, he was sounding less like a nuisance and more like a criminal.

Will let some time pass before answering. "What about the cop?"

"She recognize you?"

"No." Will shoveled another mound of peas into his mouth. And because there was some space left in his cheeks, he crammed in half a biscuit to help soak up the grease.

Tony pulled back a chair from the table. He sat down a few feet away, arms crossed, legs spread. His injuries were more pronounced in the harsh kitchen light. The gash on his face would leave a bad scar.

Tony said, "That was smart thinking, Bud. Make sure she don't recognize you. Make sure we don't gotta problem."

Will struggled to swallow. "I don't know about you, but I don't have a problem."

Cayla laughed. Just as quickly, her expression turned dark. "What are you doing down here?"

Will turned around. There was a little boy standing in the doorway. His hair was a mess. His pajamas were too big for his spindly body. He clutched a picture book to his chest. The material seemed a little young for him, but Will was hardly an expert.

"Shit," Cayla cursed. "What did I tell you about staying upstairs?"

The boy opened his mouth to speak, but she didn't let him answer.

"I told you you'd get hungry." She got up from the table to fix another plate. She introduced the kid to Will: "This'n's Benji, my sister's kid. Benji, this is Mr. Black."

"Her real sister," Tony amended. He pushed his chair back until it touched the counter. Benji wouldn't go near him. He took the long way around, sitting opposite Will with the book in his lap.

"Here." Cayla plopped down a plate that was considerably less generous than the portions she gave Will. She asked Tony, "I guess I gotta feed you, too?”

“Gimme one a them breasts.” He grabbed at her, giggling like it was a game.

Cayla slapped away his hands. “Jesus, Tony.” She turned back to the stove, muttering to herself.

Will looked at Benji, who was staring down at his lap. Will tried not to be too obvious as he studied the boy. He had a familiar look about him, like he expected at any moment that something bad was going to happen. His shoulders were rolled inward. He kept his head bowed. His ears practically rotated as he listened for a change in tone, an indication of danger. Will recognized the survival tactic. When adults got mad, kids usually ended up being collateral damage.

Will asked Benji, “Are you from Macon?”

Rather than answering, the kid looked at his aunt.

Cayla supplied, “Baton Rouge. At least that’s where they were this last time. His mama’s on the pipe. Can’t break the habit. The po-po found ’em livin’ in her car.” She rested her hand on Benji’s bony shoulder. Will would’ve missed the flinch if he hadn’t been watching.

Cayla said, “I couldn’t let ’em put Benji in a home again. Last time, he near about got killed. And I mean real killed, not just pushed around.”

Will guessed Benji knew all of this, but he didn’t like that the kid was hearing it again. He asked Benji, “How old are you?”

This time, he answered himself, showing Will nine fingers.

“What’s that book you’re reading?”

Benji held up the book. Will couldn’t read the cursive letters, but the C at the beginning and the smiling monkey told him he was looking at Curious George. The book had obviously been read a lot. The pages were dog-eared. The cover was worn. Will wondered if something was wrong with the boy. “Which school do you go to?”

Benji returned the book to his lap. He stared down at his hands.

Cayla blew out a put-upon sigh. “What’s gotten into you, child? Tell him where you go to school.”

Benji’s voice was squeaky. “I’m in Miss Ward’s fourth-grade class at Barden Elementary School on Anderson Drive.”

Will gave a low whistle, as if he was impressed. “That sounds like a nice school. Do you like it there?”

The boy's slender shoulders went up in a shrug.

"What's your favorite subject?"

He glanced at Cayla, but before she could answer for him, Benji said, "Math."

"I like math, too," Will said, which was actually true. Numbers had offered a respite, some sort of weird proof that despite Will's inability to read like the other kids, there was at least one thing he could do right.

"Fractions," Benji whispered. "My mom does them with me." He looked up at Will, his eyes moist with tears. The fluorescent bulbs made the corners glow. He looked so desperate that Will couldn't meet his gaze.

"Eat up, hon." Cayla pushed Benji's plate closer. She'd given him a spoonful of peas, a biscuit, and a chicken leg. The meal didn't seem like enough, but Benji didn't complain. He didn't start eating, either. He seemed to be waiting for permission.

Will picked up the large piece of fried chicken Cayla had smothered in gravy. She was right about her scalding skills. The crispy skin practically melted in his mouth. Too bad he wasn't hungry anymore.

Will had seen a lot of shell-shocked kids passing through the Atlanta Children's Home, but Benji was the loneliest child he'd ever shared a table with. He resonated at a different frequency. His movements were stilted. His expression was a mask of neutrality, but his eyes—there wasn't a nine-year-old on the planet who had yet mastered concealing the kind of pain Will read in Benji's eyes.

He missed his mother. She had obviously neglected him, likely abused him, but he still needed his mom. She'd helped him with his fractions. Maybe she'd worked on the rest of his homework, too. She'd undoubtedly moved him around a lot, staying one step ahead of child welfare services because even crack whores didn't want to admit that they were bad mothers.

Benji's lack of accent was the big giveaway. He'd probably never stayed one place long enough to pick one up. He sounded better educated than the three adults in the house. He had better table manners, too. He used his fork and knife to peel away the skin on the chicken leg.

Tony snorted. "Where'd you learn them airs, boy?"

"Leave him be," Cayla shot back. She moderated her tone as she asked Will, "You like working at the hospital?"

Will nodded and talked with his mouth full. "How long have you been there?"

"About five years," she answered, which was a lie. Cayla's tax records had her working part-time for several different doctors before landing the pharmacy job six months ago. Even then, she still rotated in and out of the offices on her off days, probably to help pay her DUI fine. And pay for a house with a mortgage that was so far underwater she could see China from her front porch.

She said, "The hospital's all right. I like the pharmacy hours. With Benji here, I've gotta be home when school's out."

Benji stiffened, as if he was surprised to hear the news.

"How long has he been living with you?" Will asked.

"This time?" She shrugged. "I guess a couple of weeks or so. Ain't that right, Benji?"

"A month," Benji told Will. He probably had a calendar in his head where he marked each day. His voice was quieter when he said, "They took me away a month ago."

Tony offered, "I been at the hospital a year. Can't say I like it. Cleaning up shit and puke all day. People treatin' me like I'm the help."

Cayla's face creased with an angry frown. "Then why don't you go back to Beaufort, with the rest of the Geechees?"

Will ignored her sharp tone, concentrating on her words. "Beaufort? That's where the Sea Islands are, right? Over in Carolina?"

Tony narrowed his eyes at Will. "Why you askin'?"

Will shrugged his shoulders. "I rode my bike through there a while back. Hit Charleston, Hilton Head. Made my way down to Savannah. Pretty coastline."

Cayla's lighter snapped as she lit another cigarette. "Yeah, well, Tony ain't from the pretty parts. He spent his summers livin' with his mama on the wrong side of Broad."

While Will wasn't surprised to learn that Tony was on the wrong side of anything, he was very curious about this new piece of information. The GBI had run an extensive background check on Anthony Dell. He was born just outside of Macon. His records had him living in the area all of his life, but there would be no mention in the files of where Tony spent his school vacations.

Will asked Tony, "You ever been to Hilton Head?"

Instead of answering, Tony just stared at Will. Suspicion oozed out of every pore.

Will stared back, wondering how far he should push it. Big Whitey had been tracked through both Hilton Head and Savannah. Tony had probably been hearing about the man for years. It suddenly made sense why he was so desperate to be part of the action. Little guys always wanted to run with the big dogs.

Cayla supplied, "Tony spent a coupla three summers on Hilton Head." She arched an eyebrow at Tony. "His mama was a waitress when she wasn't spreadin' her legs for rent money."

Tony's face soured, but he didn't contradict her.

Cayla continued, "She hopped around all the dive bars, worked until they got tired of her or realized she was stealing too much." She took another hit from the cigarette. "Tony lived with her every summer since he was, what, Benji's age? Weren't you eight or nine when they got divorced?"

Tony gave a sully one-shoulder shrug, but at least Will knew why this bit of history hadn't come up on the background check. Unless a kid got arrested or ended up in juvie, there were very few public records until they turned old enough to buy a car, rent an apartment, or start paying taxes.

Will said, "I like it up there."

"You mean over there," Tony countered. His eyes went beady. "It's over, not up."

Cayla cut in, "It's over and up, you idiot."

"I know what a map looks like."

Will let them argue. Geography had never been his strong suit, but he knew that South Carolina's Lowcountry dangled into Georgia's coast. He waited for a lull in the sibling spat, then said, "Better beaches on the coast than Florida's got, anyway."

"Whatta you know about Florida?" Tony demanded. He seemed angrier than the conversation warranted, which led Will to believe he was on the right track.

Will said, "It's a state."

"Don't fuck me around, son."

"Jesus, Tony." Cayla huffed a stream of smoke. "What crawled up your ass?"

Tony leaned forward, his fists pressing into the table. He asked Will, "When you ever been to Florida?"

"He's from Georgia," Cayla said. "Where else is he gonna go on vacation?”

Tony wasn't mollified. His anger filled the room. Benji went into lockdown mode. He slid down in his chair. His neck all but disappeared into his shoulders. He stared at his book like he'd never read it before.

Will took a bite of chicken. He chewed slowly, drawing out the time. Tony fidgeted. He was not a patient man. Will finally swallowed. "I was at MacDill."

Cayla asked, "You were in the Army?"

"Air Force." Will stared at Tony as he took another bite of chicken. The man had damn good reason to be suspicious. The coincidences were stacking up. MacDill Air Force Base was in South Tampa, not far from Sarasota, where Big Whitey had reportedly killed his first cop off the Tamiami Trail.

Cayla asked, "Were you an officer or anything?"

"I was target practice." Will used a biscuit to soak up some grease on the plate. He popped it into his mouth, still keeping his eyes on Tony.

Cayla asked, "They kick you out?"

"We agreed to go our separate ways."

She laughed, like he'd made a joke. "I woulda liked to've seen you in your uniform. You got any pictures?"

Will pretended he didn't hear the question. Tony seemed incapable of doing the same.

"Why do you want a picture of him?" Tony yelled. "You ain't never asked for no damn picture of me."

Cayla rolled her eyes. She asked Will, "You ever been to Miami?"

Will shook his head. "Didn't seem worth the trip." Because Tony had a racist streak, he added, "A little too dark down there for my taste."

Tony nodded, but he was still on edge. He obviously thought he had a shot at Cayla, which was equal parts alarming and disgusting. Will guessed it was better for Tony to be jealous than suspicious. Either way, he kept his eye on the man. It was always the little ones who fought dirty.

"Hey, Tony." Cayla tried to break the tension. "You remember I went up the Tamiami a few years ago. Hit Naples, Venice, Sarasota. Me and Chuck took his Harley up the trail."

"That fuckin' tool," Tony grumbled, the name obviously grating.

Will feigned disinterest. He peeled off the last piece of chicken and tossed it into his mouth. There was a toughness to Tony's posture that he hadn't seen before. Faith had a working theory that Tony Dell was more dangerous than they suspected. Will had shot her down because the guy came across as an irritant, more like a gnat. Looking at Tony now, Will wondered if Faith was right.

"You gonna drink that?" Tony asked.

He meant the beer. Will shrugged. "Help yourself."

Tony pounded back the beer. His Adam's apple bobbed as he drank too fast. Beer slid from the corners of his mouth. The requisite burp was followed by a bang as he slammed the can on the table.

Cayla ignored the display. She twisted the tip of her cigarette in the ashtray, shaping the end. She asked Will, "What were you in for?"

She meant jail. Will shrugged.

Cayla eyed him. "I bet you gotta strong temper on you." She said it as a compliment. "That what got you into trouble?"

Will shrugged in a way that let her know she was right.

"Think I'll have another." Tony walked around the table, pressing his hand on the top of Benji's head as he went to the fridge. Bottles rattled as he opened the door. Cayla had enough beer for the zombie apocalypse. There was hardly any food.

Tony asked Will, "Why'd you bail on the Air Force?"

Will gnawed at the chicken bones, sucking the marrow.

Again, Cayla tried to intervene. "I love those Gulf beaches with their white sand. Don't you think, Tony? The Atlantic's too cold."

Tony beamed. All it took was a little positive attention. The tough guy was gone. The gnat was back. He joked, "Shit, girl. You don't know what you're talking about."

"I know what beach I like."

"You don't know nothin'."

Will let Tony and Cayla debate the finer points of sands and tourist bars while he watched Benji. The boy moved like a bird, his arms held close to his sides like he was afraid of knocking something over. At the children's home, they had all eaten like ravenous animals, shoveling down food, wrapping their arms around their plates to keep thieves at bay. This kid had obviously been trained to be seen in public. He kept a napkin in his lap. He wiped his hands and mouth. He made sure that he chewed each bite before swallowing.

Will was a teenager before he realized that the reason he kept choking every time he ate was because he wasn't chewing enough.

Benji gave Will a furtive glance. He knew he was being watched. Will winked at him. Benji quickly looked back down. He was probably thinking about his mother—wondering where she was, if she was thinking of him, what he'd done wrong to make her go away in the first place.

Will had seen that look before, too.

"Hey." Tony snapped his fingers in Will's face.

Will was with Bill Black on this one. He slapped away Tony's hand.

"Damn, son." Tony held his hand to his chest. He nodded toward the faucet. "I was just asking could you help me with that?"

Will realized he'd been hearing the leak since he walked into the kitchen. "Probably needs a new washer."

Cayla's voice got high-pitched, the way some women's did whenever they asked a man to help them. "You wouldn't mind fixing it for me, would you, Bud? I'm not good with tools."

Will hesitated. Fixing things was what he did for Sara, like replacing a blown lightbulb or painting the tops of her doors. "Don't have the right tools."

"I got some in the truck," Tony offered.

Before he could stop himself, Will said, "I thought you told me you borrowed the truck."

Tony grinned. "Borrowed everything on it, son."

"You got a washer?" Will asked. "That's probably what it is. Might be ceramic. That's not a cheap faucet."

Cayla seemed pleased to hear this. "I got it at the Home Depot. Figured I could treat myself for once."

"Store's still open." Tony started playing with the faucet. "Why don't you and me go fetch a washer, fix this sink right up?"

Will sat back in his chair. He felt trapped between his job and Sara. He hadn't forgotten about their conversation on the phone. His girlfriend needed him. At least she would until Will told her the truth. Then again, Tony seemed relaxed and chatty. He might be more forthcoming about his past without Cayla around.

Tony turned off the faucet. "Shit, Bud, come on. It ain't like I'm askin' you on a date."

"Speaking of which," Cayla inserted. "Bud, why don't you follow Tony on your bike? That way you can drive yourself back here."

"Hey, now," Tony said. "That ain't nice."

"Ya think?" she countered. "Come on, Bud. That sink's been driving me crazy for weeks."

Will looked at Benji. The kid stared back. Will asked him, "What do you think?"

Benji chewed his lip. The skin was chapped. His eyelids were heavy. Will could see dark circles underneath. Maybe he stayed up nights looking out the window, waiting for his mother. Or maybe he couldn't sleep because the guilt of losing her was too much.

Will stood from the table. Being around this kid was screwing with his head. "All right," he told Tony. "Let's go."

Will rode alongside Tony in the truck. His bike was in the back, strapped down with some bungee cords Cayla had in her garage. Every turn, Will could hear the bike groan in protest, but the night had turned cold and rainy and Will was grateful to be in the warm, dry cab.

Tony was supposed to drop him off at the home improvement store. Will still couldn't decide whether or not he was going back to Cayla's. She'd seemed certain Will would return. She'd kept touching him—rubbing his back, grabbing his arm. She'd even kissed his cheek before he left. Will had tolerated the contact, but he couldn't stomach the thought of returning to that cramped house with its stuffed dolls and air of desperation.

Besides, Tony was looking like the better way into Macon's ever-changing drug scene. He'd loosened up on the drive. He talked a bit about Hilton Head, his boyhood summers spent sleeping on the beach and stealing wallets from stupid tourists who left their stuff out in the open while they swam in the ocean.

As with the previous night when they'd driven to Lena's house, Tony was fidgety—playing with the radio, tapping his fingers on the dashboard, keeping one hand barely on the wheel. His music selection was surprising. The Madonna CD in the player was from the eighties. He hit the replay button on "Like a Virgin."

"I saw her at the Atlanta Omni back in '87." Tony took a sip of beer. He'd already washed down a couple of pills from a Baggie in the glove compartment. "She's a tiny little thing. Got them weird bras make her tits look like bullets." Will stared out the window.

"Sorry about before," Tony said. "When I got mad about Florida."

Will shrugged.

"I had some bad shit go down in Sarasota when I was sixteen." Instead of asking for more, Will shrugged again. "No problem."

"Got arrested down there. Near 'bout got my ass thrown in jail." He gave a wet-sounding belch. "Gave the cops my brother's name. Half brother. He's a stupid little shit. Got himself thrown in for twenty years off a bank holdup." Tony laughed. "Dumbass hit a bank. Can you believe that?"

Will shook his head. As crimes go, robbing a bank offered the lowest payout with the highest risk. "Not too bright."

"You damn right. They tracked him straight back to his old lady's door." Tony finished the beer. He rolled down the window and threw out the can. "Don't tell Cayla what I said about giving his name to the cops."

"She won't hear it from me."

"Good deal." He popped open another can of beer. "Cayla's all hung up on us being related, but my daddy was with her mama less than two years. That ain't nothin'. And even if it was, I don't care."

Will held back a response.

"I seen you lookin' at her, Bud. I don't mind that. I know she's pretty. Lots of men like to look at her." He pointed his finger Will's way. "Just don't touch her."

There was a threat in his voice, but Will was so far removed from being interested in Cayla Martin that he couldn't take it seriously.

"Her mama's got four other kids. They put me in the basement with the boys. She used to come down there when she was drunk and show me a good time."

Will's shock must have been apparent.

Tony snorted beer up his nose. He coughed it out of his mouth.

“No, man, not the mama. I’m talking about Cayla. She’d come down them stairs wearing her panties and a tight shirt and pretty soon the sheet I’m under’s lookin’ like a pup tent.” He chuckled at the memory. “I can’t even tell you the shit we got up to down there. Liked to burn down the house.”

Will fervently hoped he would not. “How long have you known her?”

Tony didn’t have to think about it. “Been in love with her since we was fifteen.”

“That’s a long time.”

“Damn right it is.”

Will looked out the window as Tony chugged his beer. There were three cans left in the six-pack. Will guessed from the shape and color of the pills in the Baggie that Tony had taken some Oxy.

Will said, “Slow down.”

Tony’s foot was already on the brake. He pressed the pedal, but the speed barely changed. “I know Cayla gives me shit sometimes, but I’m the one she always calls when she needs something.” He glanced at Will. “That’s when you know how a woman feels about you. The shit hits the fan, who does she call?”

Will tried not to think about Sara.

“You hear what I’m sayin’?”

Will nodded.

“I mean it, Bud. I love her. She’s the only damn reason I get up some mornings.” He wiped under his eyes with the back of his hand. “She’s all I got.”

Will didn’t have many male friends, but he gathered sitting around talking about love while listening to Madonna was not high on the list of manly pursuits. “You’re gonna grow a vagina if you keep talking like that.”

Tony barked a laugh. “Hell, Bud, that’s just what she does to me. Ain’t you never been in love?”

Will was so in love that he couldn’t see straight.

“What was it like at MacDill?”

Will took his time answering—not because he had to recall the details, but because Bill Black wasn’t the type to volunteer information. “Why do you want to know?”

“I dunno, man. Just curious. I knew a couple pilots from there. Sold ’em amp to keep ’em awake on long flights.”

So, that's what Tony Dell was doing in Sarasota.

Tony pressed, "What was it like?"

"Hot."

"That's Florida all right."

Will stared out the window. They were on the highway now. Several cars were out, stragglers with a long commute. "What's the story with your nephew?"

"Benji." Tony put a nasty spin on the name that Will didn't like. He probably thought the kid was in his way. "His mama's a whore. Cops caught her smoking crack in front of him."

"That's too bad."

"He's a little shit. Keeps mouthing off at school. Cayla had to leave work to pick him up. He was suspended for two days."

Will couldn't imagine Benji mouthing off to a kitten. "He's a skinny kid."

"Yeah, well, that's what happens when you're too busy hittin' the pipe to stop and feed 'em." Tony turned the radio back on. He scrolled through the song selections and settled on Cyndi Lauper.

"Seriously?" Will asked.

"I like strong women." Tony hit the blinker as he slowed for a turn.

"Where are we going?" Will asked. Home Depot was by the hospital. They were heading in the wrong direction.

Tony held up the beer can. "Thought we'd get a real drink."

"I'm not thirsty."

"You're not driving." Tony took the turn. His voice had changed. The tough demeanor was back. "You serve overseas?"

"Why?"

"Just wondering." Tony drank some more beer. "You been in Macon, what, two weeks?"

"Almost."

"You lived in Atlanta before that?" Will didn't answer.

"How'd you get the job at the hospital?"

Will tried to turn the situation back on itself. "You're asking questions like a cop."

"Shit." Tony laughed. "You think I'm a cop?"

"Are you?"

He looked at Will over his beer can. "Are you?"

"Hell no, I'm not a cop." Contrary to urban legend, law enforcement officers were free to lie with impunity. "Otherwise, I would've busted your ass ten days ago when I saw you taking pills off that cart."

Tony laughed at the memory. "Near about shit my pants when I saw you looking."

Will doubted that. Tony had clearly been testing him.

The window rolled down again. Tony tossed the can out. "Cayla used to sell 'em for me on Craigslist."

"That's dangerous for a woman."

"I always did the drops." Tony opened another beer. "College kids, mostly. We ain't sellin' the cheap stuff."

Will didn't press for details, but he was looking at Tony Dell in a new light. Faith would need to make some calls to Hilton Head and Sarasota. Tony struck Will as exactly the type of criminal who would flip on his own mother if it saved him jail time.

"Anyway," Tony said. "We ain't doin' that Craigslist shit anymore. Big Whitey kicked my game up a notch. I got more cash than I know what to do with."

"Craigslist is safer."

"Nickel and dime, bro."

"Big bills, big problems."

"The bills get big enough, you can buy your way outta the problems." Tony turned the wheel hard into a packed parking lot.

Will recognized the building. They were at Tipsie's. The neon sign on the roof showed a woman sliding up and down a pole. "You sure you wanna be back here?"

"It's cool." Tony parked the truck. "I was by here before I went to Cayla's."

Will felt the hair on the back of his neck go up. "Why'd you do that?"

"Same as you checking out that cop in the ICU, seein' did somebody recognize me."

Will didn't believe him. "And?"

"And ... we're cool." The affable Tony was suddenly back. He pulled the keys out of the ignition, shouldered open the door. "Come on, Bud. I'm still thirsty."

Will got out of the truck, though every atom of his being told him something bad was about to happen. He didn't really have a choice. Jared Long was in the hospital. Lena Adams had almost been killed. There was a drug dealer out there who seemed to enjoy hurting people. If Will didn't do his job right, a lot more people would wind up at the hospital. Or in the ground.

“Come on, Bud.” Tony walked like a bantam rooster. He was obviously hiding something. And he was very pleased with himself about it.

Will slowed his pace, trying to figure out what he was walking into. Not for the first time, he found himself wondering if Tony Dell was, in fact, Big Whitey.

Faith had brought up the possibility almost from the start. She was generally good at seeing around corners, but Will had disagreed with her. He’d met Tony Dell. He’d spent time with the man. He didn’t come across as a master strategist.

Maybe that was the point.

Everything about Tony screamed petty criminal. He worked a shitty job. He drove a shitty car. He lived in an apartment that was three doors down from a strip mall. As for his police record, he’d been arrested twice under the open bottle law, both misdemeanors. There was one charge for possession that had rolled off after a successful stint in rehab. Another charge for dealing had disappeared from the court docket on a technicality. Loitering. Jaywalking. He was a nuisance criminal, not a heavy hitter.

If Tony Dell was really Big Whitey, then the man was a genius.

Will’s iPhone was in the front pocket of his jeans. He wondered if the tracking chip would work through the club’s metal roof. Sara had GPS in her car. The system cut out the minute she drove into an underground parking lot. Will guessed it was all the steel and concrete messing with the signal. Probably the same thing would happen to his phone inside Tipsie’s.

They were ten yards from the door, but the music pounded so hard that Will felt it traveling up from the asphalt. His eardrums turned the noise into one long rumble.

Tony glanced back at Will before pushing open the door. He wasn’t smiling, which should’ve been Will’s first warning. The second warning was more obvious. The minute the door closed behind Will’s back, a hand gripped his shoulder.

Will turned around. He was used to being the tallest guy in the room, but the man behind him was approximately the size of a refrigerator. Not a standard one, either—more like a Sub-Zero with the motor on the top.

There was no use asking questions.

The Refrigerator nodded toward the back. Will got the message. The man's hand stayed clamped to Will's shoulder, acting as a rudder as he pushed Will through the crowded bar.

Tony led the way. He didn't appear to be surprised by this latest development. He certainly wasn't worried. There was a nasty grin on his face, which Will saw every time the man glanced over his shoulder to make sure Will was following. The strobe lights and mirror ball picked out the cuts and bruises on his face, making them look like badly applied makeup. Tony must've been hurting, but his expression was one of pure glee.

There was no denying that he'd set this up beautifully. Tony had wormed his way into Cayla's house. He'd tricked Will into leaving with him. It was Tony's idea to fix the sink. It was Tony's idea to strap Will's bike into the truck. He'd obviously anticipated the problem. There just happened to be a winch in the back of the truck along with a couple of four-by-four posts to use as a ramp. When this was all done, he would probably use them to roll the bike into the river.

Will took the deepest breath he could manage. The sour smells of alcohol and sweat filled his lungs. He reached his hand into his pocket. His thumb found the power button on the phone. He pressed it three times to engage the recording device. Either Amanda would listen to Will talking to some bad guys or she would listen to some bad guys murdering Will.

The Refrigerator jerked Will to the side, avoiding a crowd of boisterous drunks. The route to the back of the club was circuitous. The stage snaked through the room. Every pole had a woman doing something obscene to it. The men crowded in, pushing against the stage until a bouncer shoved them back, then pushing forward again on the off chance that it'd work the third or fourth or hundredth time.

Tony stood at a closed door with a sign on it. The shit-eating grin was still on his face. He waited for Will and the Refrigerator to catch up. The grin got wider as Tony pushed open the door. The room was dark. The hand on Will's shoulder shoved him forward. Will saw that the room wasn't a room, but a long hallway. What little light they had came from the open door. The last thing Will saw was the Refrigerator closing it.

Tony's mouth went to Will's ear. "Move." He pushed Will down the hallway.

Will considered his options. He could easily take Tony Dell. He'd pushed him around like a rag doll before. But that had been the old Tony, not the Possibly Big Whitey Tony. Sometimes, the physical size of a man didn't matter nearly as much as the size of the fight in the man.

And Tony had help.

He had a lot of help.

Will pressed his hand to the cement-block wall as he walked down the hallway. He became painfully aware of his full bladder. Sweat dripped down his back. He imagined his Glock, the way the grip felt in his hand, the fact that the safety was a hair trigger built into the main trigger that only engaged when your finger pulled back. Not that any of this mattered. The gun was locked in a safe in his closet back in Atlanta.

There must've been soundproofing in the back of the club, because the music wasn't so unbearable anymore. Will felt something in front of him. He panicked, then realized he was touching a curtain. Will pushed the material apart. There was more light in this part of the hall, courtesy of a green Exit sign over the door. Will would've run full out toward it if not for the second Refrigerator blocking the way. He made the first Refrigerator look more like a mini-fridge. His arms bulged at the sleeves. His shoulders were almost as wide as the doorway. He had a Bluetooth device stuck in his ear. As Will approached, he tapped the earpiece and mumbled something incoherent.

Refrigerator Two pulled back a curtain on the wall. There was another door with a sign. Will could recognize words he'd seen a million times before. This one said OFFICE. The second Refrigerator opened the door. His hand was so big that the knob completely disappeared.

Will shaded his eyes against the sudden bright light. The back room of the club was remarkably similar to the type he was used to seeing in mob movies: Black ceiling, dark red walls. Liquor posters with naked women. A white shag rug. A large metal and glass desk. A black leather couch with three fat rednecks sprawled across it.

They were eating pizza from a box on the glass coffee table in front of them. The odor of cheese and sausage turned Will's stomach. He tasted bile, felt some black-eyed peas roil up into his mouth.

The rednecks examined Will and Tony with idle curiosity. In a mobster movie, they would've been well-dressed Italians. Macon's version was considerably more down-market. They wore T-shirts that stretched across their bellies. Their jeans were low on their hips, but only because they didn't want to go up six sizes to accommodate their expanded waistlines.

Refrigerator Two closed the door. Will saw that he'd missed something across the room from the couch.

There was a man tied to a chair. Rope cut into the bare flesh of his arms and chest. His head hung down. The scalp was ripped at the crown. The head wound wasn't the only source of blood. His hands and feet had been sliced open. There were dozens of X's cut into his chest and abdomen. The wounds weren't deep enough to kill, but deep enough to cause excruciating pain.

The man had been tortured.

"Damn," Tony said, not with shock but with admiration. "Didn't know y'all had company."

"Shut up," one of the rednecks said. He used a folding knife to clean underneath his fingernails. "You do what I tell you to do?"

"Don't I always?" Tony answered.

"Watch your tone with me, boy."

"Yessir," Tony demurred.

So much for Tony being Big Whitey. Will gathered the redneck was in charge. He had the air of a man burdened with responsibility. His two henchmen ate their pizza like they were waiting for their turn at the bowling alley. One of them had a bottle of beer to wash it down. The other had a Diet Coke.

The redneck kept cleaning his nails. No one seemed interested in rushing him.

Will just stood there. This wasn't the first time tonight that he'd wondered whether or not Tony Dell was leading him to his death, but it was the first time he actually saw how it might happen. The man in the chair was still alive. Blood didn't run like that if the heart had stopped beating. His breaths were shallow. His muscles twitched involuntarily—first the arm, then the calf. A low humming noise came from his throat. He was probably praying for his death. They had cut him. They had beaten him. And then they had taken a dinner break because they were in no rush to end his suffering.

Tony wasn't as patient. Or maybe he was just stupid. He took a Baggie of pills out of his pocket and tossed them onto the desk. "Where's the big man? You said we were gonna talk."

"Shut up," the redneck repeated. He finished cleaning his nails. The knife blade was about four inches—not long, but sharp, with a wicked curved tip. He slowly folded the blade back into the handle, his eyes on Will the entire time. "You gotta problem?"

Will shook his head.

"We gonna have a problem?"

Will shook his head again.

The redneck stood up, groaning from the effort. He was a big guy, not muscular like the matching refrigerators but fat around the middle.

He walked over to the desk. His gait was slow, cumbersome. He picked up a file folder from the desk. "William Joseph Black." Will waited.

The redneck picked up a pair of reading glasses. He didn't put them on. Instead, he used them like a magnifying glass on the file.

He read, "Born in Milledgeville, Georgia. Sealed juvie record. Joined up at twenty-two. Got kicked out at twenty-five. Couple of assaults on some women. Beat down a mall cop. Served time in the Atlanta jail. Pissed off some feds in Kentucky. Wanted for questioning on a stickup and a couple break-ins." The redneck waited. "That about sum it up?" Will didn't answer.

He tossed the file back on the desk. "You're renting a room at the Star-Gazer Motel off the interstate. Number fifteen. You park your midnight-blue Triumph motorcycle in the space two doors down. You eat at the RaceTrac. You work at the hospital. You come here to get your dick hard. Your mother died while you were serving in Iraq. Your father is unknown. You have no siblings and no family to speak of."

Will let his lips open a slit to take in some air. The only reason he'd chosen to ride a bike was to make sure no one followed him to Atlanta. To Sara. Will's heart thumped as he waited for the redneck to tell him her address.

Instead, the redneck asked, "Zeb-deeks?"

This time, Will didn't respond because he didn't know what the hell the man was talking about.

"Zeb-deeks?" the redneck repeated. "You know him?"

It was a name. A man.

The redneck waited. His patience seemed in endless supply.

Will stumbled through Bill Black's life. There was no high school or college, just Air Force and jail. The name sounded foreign, but his military file wouldn't have those kinds of details. Zeb-deeks was probably a nickname, which normally wouldn't help Will except that there was only one guy in Bill Black's life whose name started with a Z.

Zebulon Deacon had been knifed at the Atlanta jail for ratting out his crew. Bill Black had been in the same cell block. He would know of the guy. He would certainly know the nickname.

More importantly, Black would also know you didn't rat out anybody without a fight.

Instead of answering the redneck, Will shrugged.

"You don't know him?"

Again, Will shrugged.

The redneck said, "Junior?"

One of the henchmen lumbered up from the couch. Junior was as big as his boss, but younger. Undoubtedly stronger.

There was no preamble. Junior punched Will so hard in the face that he saw flashes of light. His head snapped back. His neck cracked. The bridge of his nose felt like a hatchet had struck bone.

"Zeb Deeks," the redneck said.

Will shook his head—not to disagree, but to get his senses back. He'd been punched in the nose more times than he could count. The worst part came when you sniffed and the chunk of blood sitting in the back rolled down your throat. Will struggled not to vomit as he swallowed it down.

For the fourth time, the redneck said the name. "Zeb Deeks?"

Junior pulled back his fist.

"All right," Will said. "Yeah, I know him. Snitch got what he deserved."

"Where'd he get it?"

"Quad."

"Where'd he get it?"

"In the junk," Will said. "They stabbed him with a broken toothbrush. He bled out in the yard." Tony chuckled. "Bet that hurt."

The redneck's chest rose and fell. He studied Will for a moment, then nodded toward the last henchman on the couch.

The third man stood up just as slowly as the others, his knees popping, his gut bulging. Contrary to physics, he and Junior worked fast. Before Will knew what was happening, his arms were pinned behind his back.

The redneck walked over to Will. He smelled of pizza and alcohol. He was a smoker. He breathed like a steam engine. He was big and he was white, but Tony had made it clear the redneck wasn't Big Whitey. Will doubted he would ever meet the man who was in charge of this gang of violent hillbillies. He doubted he would see anything other than the moldy back room of this club for what little time he had left in his life.

The redneck held up his hands so Will could watch what he was doing. The handle on his folding knife was pearl with gold accents. The light caught on the blade as he opened it. There was blood on the hinge, caked into the rivets, probably from carving X's into the man tied to the chair. The redneck was a natural with the knife. He held the handle with a light grip, almost like another thumb or finger.

Will flinched as he felt the sharp stainless-steel blade trace across his neck. Then up the side of his face. Then underneath his eye. The redneck pressed a little harder and the skin opened. Will was so terrified that it didn't even hurt. He wouldn't have even known he was cut but for the bead of blood that rolled down his cheek.

Will closed his eyes. He wasn't here. He wasn't in this room. Maybe talking to Cayla and Tony about the beach set him off. He could smell the salt in the air, feel the warm, gentle breeze rolling in off the ocean.

Three months ago, Sara had taught Will how to fly a kite. They were on the beach in Florida. The kite was yellow and blue and had a long white tail. Will had never taken a beach vacation before. All his knowledge about Florida came courtesy of Wikipedia and Miami Vice. Sara was a good teacher. Patient, kind. Sexy as hell in her bathing suit. Her father had taught her how to fly a kite when she was little. He'd been worried that Sara would feel pushed aside by her new baby sister, so he'd taken her on little day trips to make her feel special.

Will's eyes shot open. The knife was in his ear—not the soft fleshy part, but the bit right at the inside where a thin layer of cartilage lay against the skull.

The redneck was smiling, enjoying the effect. The man had perfect white teeth. His gums looked almost blue against them.

Will didn't move. The knife was needle sharp. The tip broke through his skin, sliced open the cartilage. A drop of blood slid inside his ear. With excruciating slowness, it traveled down the canal. Will felt a shudder coming on. It started slow, like the rumble of an oncoming train. A slight tremble, then a shaking that built and built until the earth started to move and his teeth were rattling and the ground felt ripped out from under him.

The redneck jerked out the knife just in time.

"Fuck!" Will shook his head violently. The grip on his arms got tighter. He shook his head again. The blood was still moving inside his ear.

The redneck laughed as he folded the blade back into the handle. "Take off your clothes."

Junior and number three released him. Will jammed his pinkie in his ear and moved it like a clapper in a bell.

"Take off your clothes," the redneck repeated.

Will glared at him. "Go fuck yourself." He headed toward the door, but Junior stopped him.

The redneck offered, "We can do this the hard way."

Junior pushed Will into his partner, who in turn slammed Will into the wall.

The redneck asked, "Hard way, easy way?"

Will couldn't think about the beach anymore. He couldn't think about Sara or anything else but staying alive.

Bill Black could handle this. He had been in his share of back rooms. He had dealt with lowlifes and bad guys all of his life. According to his records, he'd been a lowlife and bad guy all of his life.

Will didn't know what boot camp was like other than what he'd seen in the movies, but he was very familiar with the intake process at the Atlanta jail. Bill Black would've been one of at least a hundred new inmates the guards checked in that day. They'd stripped him, searched him, shaved him, deloused him, then thrown him into a five-by-nine cell with another man and an open sewage pit for a toilet. There were communal showers. There were occasional cavity searches. There was nowhere to hide.

Undressing for a bunch of violent hicks was not something that would faze a guy like Bill Black.

Will ripped open his shirt. Some of the buttons popped loose. His T-shirt came next, then his jeans. Will used the toe of one boot to brace the heel of the other as he stepped out of the shoes. He kicked off the jeans.

The room went silent but for the muffled beats of club music.

They stared at him like an exhibit at the zoo.

Will didn't look at his body much. As grateful as he was to Sara, he didn't know how she could stand it. There wasn't a part of him that didn't tell some story of abuse—the cigarette burns around his ribs, the electrical burns that had seared a scattershot of black powder into his skin. The scars on his back where he'd been clawed by a woman who got high from huffing spray paint all morning and thought Will had bugs crawling underneath his flesh.

And that didn't include the wounds that were self-inflicted.

Tony broke the silence. "Shit, Bud. What the hell happened to you?"

Will said nothing.

For once, the redneck seemed to view Will as a human being rather than a problem to be dealt with. He asked, "Iraq?"

Will considered his options. His scars were not part of his cover. The redneck had obviously managed to get his hands on Bill Black's police record. He'd made some inquiries up the criminal food chain. Did the man have enough juice to get a military file? The GBI was good, but the United States government had offered only cursory support for Bill Black's stint in the armed forces.

The redneck pressed, "One a them ragheads get hold of you?"

Instead of answering the question, Will turned his head and looked at the wall. He figured Bill Black would feel the same way Will did. Someone had hurt him really badly, and he wasn't proud of it.

"Never mind." The redneck seemed resigned to never knowing, but he wasn't finished with his search. "Take off the shorts, too."

Will gave him a hard look.

The redneck seemed almost apologetic. "I knew a guy got caught by a cop with a wire taped to his balls."

Will knew he didn't have a choice. Either he'd undress himself or the two henchmen would. He pushed down his underwear.

The redneck glanced down, then took another look before saying, "Okay, then."

Tony raised his eyebrows. "Damn, hoss."

Will pulled his underwear back up. He reached for his jeans, but they were snatched out of his hand.

Junior searched the pockets. Bill Black's wallet and phone were found. The wad of cash he'd taken off Tony this morning was tossed onto the desk.

"Let's see what we got," the redneck held out his hand. He started with the wallet. The Velcro ripped open. Cayla's handwritten address was in the photo sleeve. He flipped past it, checking the pockets. He found four twenties, two credit cards, and the speeding ticket that passed for Bill Black's license. "Fifty in a school zone." The redneck tsked his tongue against his teeth.

Junior handed him the phone. Will grabbed his jeans.

The redneck asked, "What's the password?"

Will said, "Four-three-two-one." He yanked up his jeans as the man dialed in the code.

The redneck was more proficient than Will as he scrolled through the various screens. His lips moved when he read. "Who's the woman in Tennessee?"

Will pulled on his T-shirt. The hole in the arm had torn, ripping out the side seam.

Tony provided, "He's gotta baby by her." He felt the need to ask Will, "She the one into topiary?"

Will put on his Oxford shirt. There were three buttons left on the placket. He concentrated on closing them, though his fingers didn't want to work.

The redneck seemed to be scrolling through every screen. Will had tested the phone himself when he first got it, trying to see if there was a way to accidentally reveal the cloaked apps. Each time, he was foiled, but every system had a flaw. Will had never tested the phone with the recorder turned on. Maybe there was a software glitch that would pop up the apps and make the redneck pull out his knife again.

"Where's this?" He showed Will a photograph, one of the shots he'd taken from the highway.

"Off 16," Will said. "Thought it looked nice."

The man countered, "Geotag says it's off 475."

Will shrugged, but he felt his mouth go bone-dry. He'd forgotten about the geotags. They were part of the iPhone's location service and showed the longitude and latitude of where the pictures were taken. He had no idea whether or not the GBI program cloaked them.

"You get these off the Internet?" He showed Will the naked women.

Will's brief feeling of safety evaporated. He'd downloaded the photos from his computer in Atlanta. He didn't know what the geotag would record—where Will was when he downloaded the photos or where they had originally been taken.

Will waited, watching the man's finger swipe across the screen.

"Don't like Asians myself." The redneck kept scrolling.

Will buttoned the cuffs of his shirt, pretending like he hadn't almost pissed himself. One of the buttons was dangling by a thread. It came off in his hands. Will didn't know what to do with it. He put it in his pocket.

If he died, he wondered who would find the button in his pocket. Probably the medical examiner. Pete Hanson had retired a few months ago, but Amanda had brought in a new guy who was young and cocky and believed everything that came out of his mouth. Will wondered what he would make of the button. He wondered if Sara would hear about it. Would she think about Will every time she put on a shirt?

He took the button out of his pocket and tossed it onto the floor.

Tony made a clicking sound with his tongue. Will looked at him. Tony winked, like they were in this together. Like he hadn't delivered Will to these men for slaughter.

What had turned Tony against him? It had to be the dinner. The only way that Tony could know about the date was if Cayla told him. She must've known Tony would show up. Will could see she liked playing them off each other. Stepbrother or not, she'd obviously been stringing Tony along for years.

Or maybe it was something more dangerous. Maybe Tony still thought Will was a cop. Running into Lena's house last night hadn't been Will's smartest move. No con in his right mind ran toward gunfire, even if he had a hundred pregnant girlfriends threatening to sue him.

"All right," the redneck finally said. He handed Will the phone.

Will didn't know what to do but take it. The case was warm.

His hands were so sweaty that he nearly dropped it before he could get it back into his pocket.

The redneck leaned across the desk and pressed a button on the phone. There was a buzz, then he pressed the button again. It was some kind of signal. They all waited. And waited. Will counted off the seconds in his head, but then he lost track and had to start all over again.

A cell phone rang. The redneck took his time. The Droid was buried under a stack of papers on the desk. He answered on the sixth ring. He listened, nodding occasionally. His eyes slid Will's way. He said, "Yeah, I think you're right," then ended the call.

"That Big Whitey?" Tony asked. He was as eager as a kid. "He tell you we're cool?" He slapped Will on the back. "I told you I'd make this right, man."

The redneck took a stack of hundreds out of his pocket. He glanced at the Baggie of pills Tony had thrown on the desk and counted out ten bills. He held out the cash to Tony. "That's more than you deserve, bringing this ass-wipe into our business. Get rid of him."

Will felt panic rise, but then he realized the redneck meant the man tied to the chair. Will looked at the guy. He'd forgotten all about him. At some level, Will realized he already thought of him as dead.

The redneck said, "Leave him somewhere he'll be found."

"No problem." Tony walked over to the chair. He slapped the man's head. "Let's go, dude."

The man groaned. Spit slid out of his open mouth.

"Come on." Tony slapped him harder. "Stand up, cocksucker. Time to go."

The man struggled against the rope. Even if he wanted to, there was no way to get up.

"You believe this asshole?" Tony's eyes looked as if they were on fire. He obviously enjoyed hurting people. He kicked the chair again. There was none of the gnat about him now, just a wiry tough guy who had no problem punching above his weight.

The redneck had had enough. "Stop fucking around and get him out of here."

Tony pulled a knife out of his boot. This wasn't a folding knife, but a ten-inch hunting knife with a nasty-looking serrated edge. He cut the rope around the chair. The man pitched forward, moaning from the release. Tony caught him before he hit the floor. He flipped the knife in the air and pointed the handle toward Will. "Get his feet."

Will sawed through the rope that tied the man's legs to the chair. He glanced up as he sliced through the last few strands. The man's eyes were swollen slits in his face, but Will could see the bloody whites at the edges. Blood had trickled down his forehead, clotted in his eyelashes. His front teeth were broken. The bridge of his nose was smashed. Still, he looked familiar, but Will didn't have time to figure out why.

"Wake up, asshole." This time, Tony's fist came from below. The man's head arced back. Blood went flying. "I ain't playin', dude. Stand the fuck up."

The man tried to obey. His bare feet stuck to the rug. His legs shook. His knees wouldn't straighten.

Will stepped in. He couldn't watch this. He shouldered the man to standing, practically carrying all of his weight.

"Please ...," the man begged, his voice barely audible.

Will glanced around the room, but no one seemed moved by the plea. If anything, they were annoyed.

"Get him outta here," the redneck ordered. He went back to the couch, sat down in front of the open pizza box.

Will tried to drag the man to the door. If he could leave this room, if he could manage to get out of this club, then there might be a way to save him.

The redneck picked up a slice of pizza. "I'll be in touch, Bud. We have a job that Mr. Whitey thinks will suit your special skills."

Will grunted, but only from the effort of carrying the man. There was no helping him walk. Will lifted his full weight onto his back. Five feet to the door. Maybe three feet to the exit. Around the building, then to the parking lot. Will would take Tony's truck. He'd sucker punch him from behind, take away his keys. He would drive the man to the hospital. He would get Faith to put him into protective custody. And then Will would find Sara and fall down at her feet and pray for her to make everything better.

Will told Tony, "Get the door."

"What about the rug?" Junior asked. "Ain't no way that can be steamed out."

“Shit,” Tony complained. “I ain’t no damn rug cleaner.”

“Take it and burn it.” The redneck finished his slice of pizza. “Dump the body on his front lawn. That oughta be public enough.”

Tony made it clear he thought he was doing them a favor. He hitched up his pants. He got down on his knees. He started rolling the edge of the rug. Will turned because there was nothing to do but watch him and wait.

This was when the man decided to make his move.

Without warning, he pushed away from Will.

The man grabbed at the doorknob. His coordination was shot. His hands were slick with blood. Instead of opening the door, he fell against it. He started screaming, pounding at the door like there might be help on the other side.

Will’s instincts took over. Of all the guys in the room, he was the least lethal. He grabbed the man around the waist. He tried to cover his mouth. The man kicked him, bit him, punched him, until Will couldn’t hold on anymore.

There was nowhere to go—no windows, no doors but the one they’d come through. The man was so crazed with terror he was practically spinning in circles. The rug bunched up under his feet. He careened off the coffee table, the desk. Tony tackled him from behind, throwing him face-down on the floor.

Tony straddled him. The hunting knife was in his hands. He pounded the blade into the man’s back, his shoulders, his neck. Again and again the knife went up and down like a piston. The blade made a pop-slap noise as it pierced skin. Spaghetti strings of blood flew around him like he was inside some kind of horror-house snowglobe.

Junior jammed a gun into Will’s chest, making it clear he should stay out of it. The muzzle felt like it was touching bare bone. Junior was eerily calm as Tony wailed away with the knife. He caught the redneck’s eye, gave him a single shake of the head as if to ask, What got into that guy? His counterpart sat passively on the couch, watching the murder unfold the way he might watch a card game.

The stabbing continued long after the man was dead. Tony only stopped when he ran out of steam. He sat back on his heels. He was panting. Sweating. He wiped his face with the sleeve of his shirt. Forehead, mouth, cheeks. Blood smeared everywhere.

Junior put the gun back into the holster on his belt. Will could move now, but he didn't have anywhere to go. Twice in as many nights, he'd watched one human being attack another.

At least Lena had been responding to a threat. Tony Dell was like a jackal destroying its prey. He'd enjoyed each and every second of the kill. He'd grunted and screamed as the knife went in. The spray of blood that washed up into his face had only made him hungry for more.

And now he was laughing.

Blood smeared his teeth like lipstick. He asked Will, "How 'bout that, Buddy? You seen this nut job runnin' around? That was some crazy shit."

The redneck was not pleased. "You see the mess you made?"

"You was gonna throw away the carpet anyway."

"You didn't just get it on the carpet, did you?"

Tony looked around with awe at what he'd wrought. He shook his head, then wiped the hunting knife on his pants before trying to jam it back into his boot. The blade was bent, probably from striking the thick bone of the skull. Tony had to torque the handle to sheath the knife. And then he saw the open wound across the palm of his hand. "Shit, musta slipped over the hilt." He asked Will, "You mind takin' me to the hospital, Bud? This is the kind of shit gets infected."

The redneck sounded more put out than disgusted. "Junior, go get some of the girls to clean this up." He told Tony, "Get the body outta here. Drop him in his front yard, like I said."

Tony asked, "You sure 'bout that?"

"Came straight from Big Whitey. Put him somewhere he'll be found. The only way to send a message is make sure everybody's got a chance to read it." The redneck directed his next order to Will. "Keep an eye on him. Make sure he doesn't fuck it up."

"I ain't gonna fuck it up," Tony yelled. "You tell Big Whitey I'm the one what took care of this for him."

"You really want credit?" the redneck asked. He shook his head at Junior, who returned the gesture.

Will said, "We'll take care of it," because he thought that would get them out of here faster. He knelt down on the floor. "Roll the body onto the rug."

"Take a cue from your pal there, Tony. Good soldiers follow orders." The redneck sat back on the couch. He took out his knife again to clean his nails. "Like I said, Mr. Black. We'll be in touch."

Will wasn't going to wait around for more. He motioned for Tony to move. "Hurry up. Roll him onto the rug."

Tony pushed the body, but the physics were against him. The man was dead weight. Tony's boots skidded against the concrete floor. His face twisted into a mask of sheer determination. Finally, the man flopped onto his back. His arm was over his eyes like he didn't want to see anymore.

Tony picked up the hands and crossed them over the chest. He started toward the other side of the rug.

"No," Will said. "We have to roll the body." He took the shoulders because that was the heavier end and he couldn't watch Tony pushing around the corpse anymore.

Tony asked, "Ready?"

Will looked down at the man's face. He recognized him now, though even in death, the pain still twisted his features. Faith had shown Will his picture on her phone just a few hours ago.

The man in the chair was Detective Eric Haigh.

10.

FRIDAY

It was just past midnight, and Sara was once again sitting on the couch in the ICU waiting room. She flipped through a magazine, trying to tune out the conversations around her. More patients had been admitted that afternoon. Family members filled the small room. The new people were a communal bunch. They wanted to swap stories. They wanted to compare tragedies. Nell had not been pleased. She couldn't take the prying, the crowded space. She'd easily let Sara talk her into going back to the hotel room to get some sleep.

There was no reason for her to be at the hospital right now anyway. Jared's condition remained unchanged despite the antibiotics they were pumping into him. Sara had dealt with surgical infections before. They were as relentless as they were indiscriminate. There were very few antibiotics left that could successfully treat them.

So, as Sara had many times throughout the day, she found herself back at the same point she'd started at this morning. The twenty-four-hour clock had been reset. Jared had survived the surgery. Only time would tell if he survived the infection.

Sara put the magazine back on the table. She'd read the same celebrity gossip story three times and still couldn't follow the details. She was in some sort of weird fugue state. Yet again, she regretted the large scotch she'd had earlier that evening. Self-medication was never a good idea, but stress, alcohol, and thirty hours straight without sleep were a lethal combination. Sara had all of the hangover and none of the buzz. Her head ached. She was jittery. The fact that Sara knew when she was drinking the scotch that she was making a huge mistake only added to her misery. Her only consolation was that she hadn't ordered another one after talking on the phone with Will.

There was a conversation she wished she'd never had. Either Sara was a very cheap drunk or their relationship wasn't heading in the direction she'd thought it was. Her desperate sexual enticement had gone over like an IRS audit. Thank God she hadn't told him that she was in love with him. She could only imagine how embarrassing it would've been to have her pronouncement met with complete silence. Will was obviously pulling away. Sara had either done something or said something wrong. He was probably relieved she hadn't asked him to make the drive down. Or up. Or over. Sara still had no idea where he was.

She was just glad that he wasn't here.

And she fervently wished that she wasn't, either.

Sara couldn't sit anymore. She stood up and stretched her back. The vertebrae felt fused together. Polite smiles greeted her around the room. She walked into the hall for some privacy.

The lights were dimmed in deference to the late hour. Possum was exactly where she'd seen him thirty minutes ago. His back was to Sara. He stood at the closed doors to the ICU, looking through the window. He couldn't see into Jared's room from that angle. The cop was in his line of sight. Sara could tell the vigilance was grating on the young man. He kept glancing at Possum, then looking back at the nurses' station as if the poor woman could help him.

Possum could barely speak to Sara—not out of rudeness, but because every time he saw her, his eyes filled with tears. She didn't know whether he was crying over the loss of Jeffrey, the threat to Jared, or the unbearable combination of both.

Sara just knew she was sick of being here.

She went to the elevator, then decided the stairs would at least give her some exercise. She needed some air, to be in a room that wasn't stale with fear and tragedy. And she should probably have a conversation with herself about Will. Maybe she'd been blind to the deeper truth behind his silences. Sara had never told Will that she loved him, but then Will had never told Sara the words, either.

In her experience, the simplest explanation was usually the crappiest one.

Sara went down two flights before she saw a pink and blue sign. The maternity ward. She gladly took the detour. Whenever she was having a particularly horrendous day at Grady, she would go look at the babies. There was something so reassuring about watching brand-new eyes blink open, toothless mouths pucker into a smile. Newborns were proof that life could not only continue, but thrive.

Sara guessed not many people would be there at this time of the morning, and she was right. Visiting hours were well over. There was no nurse to send stragglers away. No one had bothered to lower the shade over the large windows so the babies could sleep in peace.

The dimmed hallway lights cast a warm glow on the rows of bassinets. The newborns were all wearing pink or blue knit hats. They were swaddled tightly in matching blankets. Their little faces were like raisins, some of them so new that their heads moved gently side to side, as if they were still floating in the womb.

Sara pressed her forehead to the window. The glass was cold. One of the babies was awake. His squinty eyes scanned the ceiling. Colorful cartoons were painted overhead—rainbows and fluffy clouds and plump rabbits. This was more for the parents than the babies. Newborns were extremely nearsighted. The basic eye structures were there, but months would pass before they learned how to use them. For now, the ceiling art was a pleasant blob.

The door behind Sara opened. She turned, expecting to find a nurse coming out of the bathroom. Instead, it was Lena Adams.

She had a tissue in her hand. Sara could see the dismay when their eyes met, then something like resignation. Lena headed toward the elevator.

“Wait,” Sara said.

Lena stopped, but didn’t turn around.

Sara instantly regretted the word. She didn’t know what to say. Was she sorry? Certainly, she felt bad that Lena had lost the baby. But that didn’t change what had come before.

All Sara could manage was, “You don’t have to leave.”

Slowly, Lena turned. She didn’t acknowledge Sara. Instead, she walked over to the viewing window. Her fingers rested on the edge of the sill. She leaned her forehead against the glass, the same as Sara had. She seemed to wall off everything else around her. There was something so tragic about the way she looked at the newborns. Her longing seemed to pierce the glass.

The familiar sense of trespass took hold. Sara opened her mouth to take her leave, but Lena didn't give her a chance to speak.

"Is he the same?"

"Jared?" Sara asked. "Yes."

Lena just nodded, her eyes still trained straight ahead. She moved her hand to her stomach, pressed the palm flat.

Again, Sara struggled against the instinct to offer comfort, to spin the situation in a more positive light. In the end, she couldn't summon the energy. Somewhere in the pit of her chest, there was the capacity to feel compassion for this woman. Sara felt it stir occasionally, like a car engine trying to start on a cold day. It would rev and rev, but eventually, it always sputtered out and died.

Again, Sara tried to leave. "I should—"

"I never realized they were so small." Lena's features softened as she watched the newborn in front of her. "It must be scary to know how fragile they are." Her breath fogged the glass. She seemed to be waiting for a response.

"You learn what to do." Sara had grown up around babies. She couldn't imagine a life without them.

Lena said, "I've never held a baby before."

"You don't have cousins?"

"No. And I never babysat or anything." She gave a low laugh. "I wasn't the kind of teenager people trusted with their kids." Sara could imagine.

Lena stuttered out a long sigh. "I didn't think it was possible to love something that needed me so much."

"I'm sorry," Sara said. "For what it's worth."

"For what it's worth," Lena repeated. "Nell doesn't hate me so much anymore."

Sara had felt the change, too, but she wasn't sure it would last.

Lena said, "It was better when she hated me. I knew how to deal with that. We both did." She turned her head to look at Sara. "It's like she thinks losing the baby makes me a better person."

Sara weighed the words, trying to decipher her motivations. Lena wanted something. She always wanted something.

"Thank you, Sara." Lena turned back to the window. "I knew I could depend on you to not feel sorry for me.”

Sara needed to leave. She couldn’t muster her old hatred right now, but she knew she could be persuaded. “I should check on Possum.”

“It kills him every time he sees you.”

Sara couldn’t argue with that. “Still—”

“Did you get my letter?”

The letter.

Four years ago, Sara had opened her mailbox to find a handwritten letter from Lena. Sara had shoved the sealed envelope into her purse. She was late for work. She didn’t want to read it. Neither, apparently, did she want to throw it away. For almost a year, the letter had traveled around with Sara. To work, to the store, to dinner, back home. She moved it when she switched purses. She saw it every time she pulled out her wallet or searched for her keys.

Lena was studying her. “You read it.”

Sara didn’t want to admit it, but she said, “Eventually.”

“I was wrong.”

“Really?” Sara asked. The letter was three pages from a legal pad. Three tedious, tearstained pages filled with excuses and lies and blame shifting. “Which part were you wrong about?”

“All of it.” She leaned her shoulder against the glass. “I knew Jeffrey would come save me. And I knew that I was putting his life in danger.”

Sara felt her face start to flush. Her heart was a bird trapped in a cage. She had waited so long to hear this admission, this validation, and now all she could think was that Lena was working an angle.

Lena said, “You can’t light a match, then act surprised when your house burns down.”

Sara worked to keep her tone even. “You tried to warn him.” At least Lena had said as much in the letter. She’d devoted four lengthy paragraphs to her regret that Jeffrey simply would not take her sound advice. “You said you told him to stay away.”

“I knew he wouldn’t.” Lena stared openly at Sara. “I should be dead now, not him.”

Sara didn’t buy the sudden conversion. She tried to trick Lena, quoting the words Jared had told Nell. “He knew the risks when he put on the badge.”

"You think Will feels the same way when he goes to work?"

From nowhere, Sara was seized by the impulse to slap Will's name out of her mouth. He'd investigated Lena almost two years ago when she'd let a suspect die in custody and stood by as another cop was stabbed nearly to death. Sara had been more disappointed than Will that he couldn't make the case stick.

She told Lena, "The only thing you know about Will Trent is that he almost sent you to prison."

"Almost." Lena's lips teased into a smile. The mask was starting to fall. "You know what I remember about my time with Agent Trent?" There was a strange lilt to her voice. "Seeing that he was already lost in you. And you're in love with him, too, right? I can see it in your face. You were always so good at being in love."

Sara shook her head. Now she could see where this was going. "It doesn't make up for it."

"You've obviously moved on," Lena told her. "Both of us have moved on."

"I didn't have a choice, Lena. I had to move on because my husband was murdered." Sara bit back the venom in her mouth. "I didn't have a choice."

"No matter what you think, I'm not a bad person. I let myself believe that for a long time. I let you convince me I wasn't good enough. Wasn't worthy enough."

"Well, I'm so sorry," Sara quipped. "Please tell me how I can make it up to you."

"You're going to find out eventually that I've changed."

"You haven't changed. Neither one of us would be here if you had." Sara struggled to keep the bitterness out of her tone. "Everything is always a game to you. What we're doing right now is a game. You never walk away. You never let anybody get the upper hand. You think you're a good cop, but you don't care about the job or anyone else who's doing it. You just want to make sure that you win no matter what it costs."

Lena smirked. "Whatever you say, Doc."

"I'm not doing this." Sara started to walk away.

"I can't believe I used to be jealous of you."

Sara turned, mouth open in disbelief.

"Your family. Your life. Your marriage. Everybody in town respected you. Worshipped you." Lena shrugged. "And then I realized one day that I didn't want to be like you. Couldn't be like you if I tried. No one can. You're too perfect. Too demanding. Nobody can meet your high standards. Jeffrey couldn't." She shook her head, as if she genuinely felt sorry. "Will doesn't stand a chance."

For a moment, Sara was too stunned to speak—not because of what Lena had said, but because she'd so masterfully turned the conversation.

Sara said, "You want me to feel guilty for moving on with my life?"

The smirk on Lena's face said it all. She echoed Sara's words from before. "Now you know how it feels."

Sara asked, "Are we going to do this now? Are we really going to do it?"

"Aren't you scared I'm going to win?" Sara crossed her arms, waiting.

"All those years I wasted thinking you were better than me. Poor Sara, the tragic widow. And then I find out you jumped right back into the saddle with the first cop you could find."

Guilt flooded Sara's senses. Lena had always been a shark who could smell even the tiniest drop of blood in the water. "That's not how it happened."

"That's exactly how it happened," Lena shot back. "You're just a fancy piece of trim. You know that?"

Sara laughed, relieved that was the worst of it. Trim was slang for women who slept with cops. "And?"

"You know what you loved about Jeffrey? That he took risks. That he went out there and beat down anybody who got in his way."

"Is that all you have?"

Lena stepped closer. "You never would've given him the time of day if he was just some pussy who let everybody else fight his battles."

"You mean like you?"

Lena pursed her lips, the only indication that she'd heard the words. "I saw the way you used to look at him—your hero. Your big, tough cop. I bet it's the same way with Will. Funny how you just slotted in one cop for the other. Wonder how Jeffrey would've felt about that?"

Sara shook her head, as if the blows weren't landing. "Is this going somewhere?"

"You wanted Jeffrey out there fighting the good fight. You loved it when he swung his dick around, kicked ass, and took names. Lemme tell you something, Sara, he took risks because you wanted him to. You got some kind of cheap thrill out of pushing him to the edge. I gave him a place to go, but you—you—were the one who rewarded him for it."

"Shut up," Sara snapped. The cut was too deep. "Just shut up."

"Doesn't feel so good, does it? Being blamed for something you couldn't control."

"This conversation is over." Sara tried to walk away, but Lena grabbed her arm. "Get your hand off me."

"I thought we were doing this."

Sara jerked her arm out of Lena's grasp.

Lena said, "You always think you're so damn smart, but you can't even see what's right in front of you." She gave a surprised laugh that echoed down the empty hallway. "Hey, I guess you make mistakes after all."

"You think I don't make mistakes?" Sara's voice shook with rage. She could barely restrain herself. "I was the one who told Jeffrey to hire you. I was the one who told him to promote you. I was the one who thought you could do your goddamn job and keep him safe."

Lena was backed against the window. Sara loomed over her. She couldn't remember moving, couldn't understand how her finger had jammed into Lena's chest or how her hand had clenched into a fist.

Slowly, Lena turned her head, offering her cheek. "Go on," she said, her voice smooth as silk. "Take your best shot."

There was a weird tickle in Sara's feet. She felt as if she was standing at the edge of a bottomless pit. She forced herself to look over Lena's shoulder at the rows of newborns swaddled in blankets. The cheerful rainbows and clouds painted on the ceiling above them.

Sara couldn't let Lena win. Not this time. Not like this. She stepped back from the edge. She dropped her hand. She straightened her spine. Sara held up her head as she walked down the long hallway.

Lena asked, "That's it?"

She just needed to make it downstairs. Once Sara was outside, once she had fresh, cold air in her lungs, she would find a way to put this behind her. The last five minutes were not going to erase the last five years. Lena had no idea what Sara had been through. How she'd struggled. How she'd carved out a new life for herself. She didn't know Jeffrey and she sure as hell didn't know Will.

The sound of slow clapping echoed down the hall. Sara forced herself not to flinch. Each clap sounded like a gunshot.

"Good for you, Doc." Lena clapped louder. "Ride your high horse right on out of here."

Sara didn't turn around. She couldn't turn around. She'd end up giving Lena the catfight she'd been spoiling for.

She pushed open the door to the stairs. Her hands would not unclench. Sara rounded the landing at a jog. Each step she took only served to ramp up her anger.

Of course Sara had loved Jeffrey because he was tough. There wasn't a woman alive who didn't want a strong man in her life. That didn't make Sara responsible for his murder. She had begged him not to trust Lena, to just once let her hang herself with her own rope. And the idea that Sara could just slot in Will for Jeffrey was preposterous. The two men had nothing in common, except that both of them would've kicked Lena to the curb if they'd heard her talking to Sara the way she just had.

Sara almost wept with relief when she reached the main floor landing. She found herself in another dimly lit hallway. There were no stragglers or visitors at this time of night. Sara followed the green line on the floor, knowing it would take her to the elevators, to the exit.

Too demanding.

Too perfect.

If only.

Sara couldn't stop herself from making mistakes. She was overwhelmed with mistakes. Little ones. Big ones. Life-altering, earth-shattering fuckups had followed her for the last five years of her life, culminating in her drive down to this godforsaken hospital.

Her cell phone rang. Sara didn't answer. She passed the closed gift shop. Mylar balloons were pressed against the ceiling. The cooler was chained shut. Sara's phone stopped ringing. Almost immediately, it started back up again. She let it ring out, go to voicemail. There were a few seconds of silence, then the ringing started up again.

Sara checked the caller ID.

JASPER, GA.

Will.

A few hours ago, his phone said he was on the coast. Now, it said he was in the mountains.

Sara answered the call. She fought to keep her tone even. "I can't talk right now."

"Where are you?"

"I'm at the hospital."

"Upstairs?"

"No." She wiped away tears. The main entrance was up ahead. The lights from the parking lot gave the lobby an ethereal luminescence. "I'm leaving."

"To go to the hotel?"

"To go home." Sara didn't realize until she'd said the words that they were true. Her purse was locked in the back of her car. The keyfob was in her pocket. The rest of her stuff was at the hotel. She'd brought a change of clothes and some toiletries she kept in her locker at Grady. None of it was worth postponing her escape. The hotel cleaning staff could throw it out or keep it. Sara didn't care. She would call the front desk on her way out of town.

"Sara?" Will asked.

"I can't talk." Her hand was clenching and unclenching. Her teeth ached from grinding them together. "I'll call you later."

"Don't hang up."

She shook her head. "I can't do this now."

"I need you to just stop. Right now."

"Will, I—"

"Sara, stop walking."

Sara stopped.

"I need to talk to you."

Sara looked down at the phone. Then she looked up. How had Will known she was walking? She scanned the empty lobby.

"Where are you?"

"I need to tell you what happened." He sounded desperate. "Not just before, but tonight. Last night."

She saw him then. He was standing outside the glass entrance doors. He was wearing dark pants and a gray shirt. Sara had seen the uniform before. The hospital maintenance staff wore it.

His hand went up to the glass.

She gave him an out. Insanely, she gave him an out. "You're working with Faith."

Will didn't answer, and Sara finally understood. The rolling phone calls. The undercover assignment he wouldn't talk about. The guilty look on his face this morning. His refusal to tell her what he was hiding. There was only one reason he would lie to her.

Sara said, "You're investigating Lena again."

"No, but she knows I'm here." Will said, "I'm sorry, baby. I'm so sorry."

Sara's eyes burned with tears. Lena didn't just know that Will was here. She knew that he'd left Sara completely in the dark.

You always think you're so damn smart, but you can't even see what's right in front of you.

"You asshole," Sara hissed into the phone. She could still hear Lena's laughter ringing in her ears. "You let her make a fool of me."

"I'm sorry." Will's hand went up again. He pressed his palm to the glass door. "I didn't think that far ahead. I didn't—" He stopped. "I need you to go easy on me, Sara. Please."

"You lied to me." Her voice was shaking again. Everything was shaking. She'd blamed herself for pushing him away when all the time Will was the one keeping her at arm's length. "You looked me right in the face and you lied to me."

"I didn't tell you because I thought you would leave me."

She felt something snap inside of her. "You were right."

"Sara—"

The pain was too much. She clutched the phone in her hand, wishing she could break it into pieces. And then she realized she could. Sara smashed the phone against the wall. Chunks of plastic and glass popped back into her face. She picked up the pieces and threw them back at the wall.

"Sara!" Will shouted. He was still outside, pulling on the closed glass doors. "Sara!"

What an idiot she'd been. She'd opened her heart to this man. She'd shared her bed with him. She'd told him things she'd never even told her husband.

And he'd given Lena Adams a knife to stab into Sara's back.

"Sara!" The locks rattled on the closed doors.

She turned away from him, heading back toward the stairs.

“Wait!”

Sara kept walking. She wasn't going to wait on him. She would never wait on him again. She had to get out of this building. Out of this town. Away from Lena. Away from Will and his lies. There was nothing else Sara could do but run away. She'd been stupid and blind. He'd betrayed her. She had given him everything, and Will had betrayed her.

“Sara!” Will's voice was louder. He was inside the building.

She quickened her pace. Will's footsteps pounded through the empty lobby, echoed down the hall. He was coming after her.

Sara started running. She couldn't bear the thought of seeing his face again. She pumped her arms, lifted her knees. Will's footsteps grew louder. The door smacked against the wall as she ran into the stairwell. Instead of going up, she went down. The staff locker room would be in the basement. Maintenance. Storage. The morgue. There would be a loading dock or an exit she could use to get the hell out of here.

“Sara!”

She was on the landing when the door banged open above her.

Will yelled, “Wait!”

She tripped, grabbing the handrail as she slid down the last few stairs. Sara pulled open the door. Another hallway. The bright lights were like needles in her eyes.

“Stop!”

Will was already on the landing. He was faster than Sara. She would never make it to the exit without him catching her. Her shoes skidded on the floor as she darted into an open doorway.

“Let me explain! Sara!”

She slammed the door shut, furiously checked for a way to lock it.

The door pushed open. She fell backward. Will grabbed her arm. He jerked her toward him. Sara slapped at him as hard as she could. He caught one of her hands. She punched him with the other one. She hated him. She wanted to scratch out his eyes. To tear his heart out of his chest the way he had torn out hers.

“Sara, please—”

She punched him again. She couldn't stop. Hitting him felt too good. She slapped his face. Her fingernails drew blood. He caught both of her hands in one of his own. Sara couldn't break free. He pushed her back against the wall. Her head banged against the cinder block. She brought up her knee, but Will was too close for her to do any damage.

He kissed her. Their teeth clashed. His fingers gripped open her jaw. His tongue filled her mouth. Sara slammed her fist into his chest. He ripped open her jeans. Sara didn't stop him. She helped him. She felt numb. Every emotion had drained away but one. She was sick of taking care of people. She was sick of being the good friend, of doing the right thing, of letting things go.

Will spit in his hand. It wasn't enough. Sara gasped as he pushed inside of her. He went deep. Too deep. It took her breath away. Still, she gripped his shoulders, holding tight, meeting each thrust until her body took over and she felt herself give.

Sara's mouth found his. She sucked his tongue. Bit his lip. Her heels dug into the backs of his legs. Will flinched when her hands slipped underneath his shirt. She didn't care. She scratched the scarred flesh on his back. Words came out of her mouth—filthy words that told him exactly what to do. Again and again she met each thrust until she had to clench her teeth to keep from screaming.

There was no slow build, just an uncontrollable rush that flowered deep inside her. The ecstasy was unbearable. Sara bit down on Will's shoulder. She tasted the salt of his sweat. Every molecule in her body pulsed from the intensity. She cried out his name. She couldn't help herself, couldn't stop the exquisite torrent of release.

Will collapsed against her. Neither one of them could stand. They slid to the floor, both breathless, both shocked by what they had done.

"Sara—"

She covered her face with her hands. She couldn't look at him. Couldn't acknowledge what had just happened.

"Sara—" Will's mouth was close to her ear. The brush of his lips brought an involuntary shiver. "Oh, God," he whispered. "Sara, please—"

She pushed him away. She could still feel him throbbing between her legs. She felt craven. Deviant.

"Sara ..."

She shook her head, wishing she could disappear. "Go," she begged. "Please, just go."

"Sara—"

“Go!” she screamed.

Will struggled to stand. She heard him zip up his pants, tuck in his shirt. There was a loud click as the door opened, then again as it closed.

Sara looked up.

He was gone.

11.

FOUR DAYS BEFORE THE RAID

Lena sat in the cramped surveillance van with her hands thrust into her jacket pockets. There were three monitors in front of her. The computers under the desk were blowing out heat. DeShawn and Paul were wearing short-sleeved shirts. They were both sweating, but Lena was so cold she could've been sitting in an igloo. She was only six weeks pregnant and already her body was out of whack. This was why pregnant women were always so cranky. Their thermometers bounced up and down like Ping-Pong balls.

DeShawn scrolled through the security cameras, asking, "Where are you, Mr. Snitch?"

"Mr. Snitch," Paul echoed, giving the name a showman's flourish.

All confidential informants had code names. Protecting a CI's identity was part of the devil's bargain. You used the name on all your paperwork. You used it in the field, where the slip of a word could mean the death of an informant. "Mr. Snitch" wasn't the most creative name, but it suited the junkie they'd turned a few days ago. There was something about the man that was slithery, like a snake. Lena thought maybe it was his scaly skin and beady little eyes.

"Come on, Snitchy." DeShawn tapped the keyboard, toggling back and forth through the cameras outside the Chick-fil-A. "Here, Snitchy-Snitchy."

Paul reminded him, "We padded in an extra hour for a reason."

Lena watched the monitors change as DeShawn scrolled through the different angles. She'd always hated junkies—probably because her uncle was one. Hank was clean now, but that didn't change his basic, junkie personality. Everything about him asked, What's in it for me?

"Here we go." Paul pointed at one of the monitors. A white car pulled into a parking space near the door. The emergency brake was pulled. The windows rolled shut.

Lena asked, "Does he have his mic on?"

DeShawn twisted the dial on the tuner that picked up Snitch's transmitter. They heard his car radio playing an ad for a pizza place. The sound cut. Keys jangled. The car door opened.

Snitch was short and wiry and needed a shave. His ballcap was pulled low on his head. Dark sunglasses wrapped around his face. He was dressed in black jeans and a black T-shirt. He kept checking over his shoulder, looking left and right, as he walked toward the restaurant.

"Moron," Paul groaned. "He couldn't just get a neon sign?"

Snitch kept looking around as he entered the restaurant. He stood in line at the counter. A woman steered clear of him as she headed toward the side exit. Lena had scheduled the meet for just after the lunch rush, but a few stragglers were waiting around for refills. She heard soft conversation under the rustle of clothes. Snitch moved up in line. He ordered an iced tea. He kept scratching himself, shifting from one foot to the other.

"Junkie needs his pills," DeShawn noted.

Lena said, "Junkie needs to do what he's supposed to do before I pull his immunity."

Mr. Snitch waited at the counter. He kept twitching. Lena wanted to reach through the monitor and make him stop.

Their entire operation depended on this junkie scumbag. For almost two weeks, Lena's team had been surveilling a shooting gallery off an anonymous tip. They didn't want to just shut it down. They wanted to decimate Sid Waller's operation. The job had quickly become an exercise in futility. Normally, there was always some lowlife who was willing to flip for cash and prizes. This time was different. No one would turn on Sid Waller. No one would wear a wire while they made a buy. No one would go on the record about the drugs and guns.

No one, that was, until Mr. Snitch.

Paul seemed to read her mind. He asked, "You still think Snitch is working both sides?"

"I don't know," Lena admitted. Mr. Snitch had asked for her by name. She'd been leaving the doctor's office when the call came through. Her celebratory dinner with Jared had turned into takeout at the station. "It's weird that he showed up right when our case was falling apart."

Paul asked, "How would he know it was falling apart?"

Lena shrugged. "Snitch was locked up for less than two hours when he told the guard to get me. How did he even know my name?"

Paul and DeShawn guffawed. Lena liked to break balls. Every junkie in town knew her name.

"All right, all right," she allowed. "Still, we've all been at this long enough to know that nobody does you any favors."

"I dunno," Paul said. "Scrawny guy like that, his first time behind bars—two hours sounds like the right amount of time for him to freak the fuck out."

DeShawn added, "Oxy's hard to come by in the pokey."

"Not if you suck enough dick." Paul held up his hand for a high-five. DeShawn readily obliged.

"Where'd he go?" Lena leaned forward, scanning the monitors.

DeShawn worked the cameras again, toggling through the different views. "There he is."

Lena saw the top of a door closing. Snitch had gone to the playground. Brightly colored plastic slides and swings circled around a sandpit. Two kids were playing on the rope climb, a boy and a girl. There were more cameras on the playground than inside the restaurant. Every corner was on display.

Snitch sat down on a bench. The sun was on his face. He stretched his arms out along the back like he had all the time in the world. They heard him humming through the microphone taped to his chest.

"They're gonna kick him out," Paul said. "Grown man ain't allowed on the playground without a kid."

"I think he'll be okay." Lena could see the staff moving lethargically behind the counter. They had all downshifted for the postlunch lull. One of the kids tossed a cup in his hand. The others watched him with a mixture of boredom and exhaustion.

"Looks like Mom's not gonna be a problem." DeShawn pointed to a lone woman sitting in a booth. She was typing on her iPad while simultaneously talking on her cell phone. Papers were spread out on the table. She was obviously working.

Paul said, "I bet she tells her husband she's spending time with the kids.”

Lena held back a response. Now that she was going to be a mother, she found herself far less judgmental. “We’ve got forty-five minutes, right?”

“Give or take,” DeShawn said. “Waller has a reputation for being late.”

Paul always had to contradict. “He might show up early, case the joint.”

“Call me on my cell if he does.” Lena pushed open the door. “I’ll be right back.”

She kept her head down as she walked across the parking lot. There was little chance of her being seen. They had set up in front of a Target, fifty yards from the Chick-fil-A. Tapping into the restaurant’s wireless security system was less than legal, but the manager should’ve better encrypted his wireless hotspot. They weren’t going to use the video anyway. DeShawn wasn’t recording. They were keeping a tight leash on Mr. Snitch. At least Lena was. She didn’t trust just the audio. She wanted to see him with her own eyes.

There was something wrong with the guy. She’d only met him a few days ago, but in her gut, Lena knew there was something off about him. She had felt it when she first sat across from him at the jail. She had especially felt it when he’d told her he could hand her Sid Waller.

Sidney Michael Waller.

Lena was more than familiar with the name. Everyone at the station was. Waller wasn’t just a drug dealer. He wasn’t just a pimp and a gunrunner. Last year, they’d all worked around the clock to make a case against Waller for raping his niece and murdering his sister. And then the niece had recanted. Witnesses disappeared. People changed their stories. The case had fallen apart three days before the trial started and everyone, especially Lena, had walked away with a bad taste in their mouths.

But then Mr. Snitch had showed up with a golden ticket. She couldn’t have written a better script for the man. He’d confirmed details about the shooting gallery off the interstate. The guns. The whores. The vast amount of drugs moving through the city while Sid Waller sat back and counted the dough. The case practically made itself. Waller would spend years behind bars. He’d get far more time for the guns than he would have off the rape.

But only if Lena ignored her gut. She had to keep tamping down the little voice inside her head that said this was too easy. She'd been gunning for Waller for a year and suddenly he fell into her lap? What was Mr. Snitch getting out of this? The immunity deal was good, but was skipping eight months in prison really worth risking his life?

Lena couldn't let herself dwell on the questions too long. She couldn't let this operation fall apart.

The truth was that Sid Waller had gotten under her skin. Lena was determined to return the favor. She brought him in for questioning every time she found a plausible excuse. She couldn't put him behind bars—yet—but she could certainly run up his legal bills. Just last week, Waller had called her a cunt during an interview. Two weeks before that, he'd told her all the different ways he could fuck her. That all of this had been recorded for prosperity didn't seem to bother him. Waller had a good attorney, the kind of attorney who knew the law better than most cops.

Maybe that's why the judge was being so difficult. Lena had tried to get a warrant for the shooting gallery based on the suspicious traffic at all hours of the night. The judge had said no. Denise Branson presented evidence that Mr. Snitch, a confidential informant, had given up the location. The judge had said no. It was only through blind persistence that they had talked the man into letting them record today's meeting. And even then, he'd only authorized audio.

This was their last chance. Lena knew there was no way the judge could say no if they got it on tape. All Mr. Snitch had to do was get Waller to talk about the house, to say something about the guns or the drugs or the money, then they could go in and bust some bad guys.

At least that's what Lena was praying for. Sid Waller was the last big case she was going to work for a while. She was looking at months of her life being consumed by her pregnancy, then a couple of weeks, maybe another month, home with the baby before she returned to work.

Just the thought of being away from the job that long made her feel antsy. Lena had always been a cop. She couldn't lose that part of her identity. Lately, it seemed like she wasn't going to have a choice. She was too tired to sleep, too sleepy to concentrate. She had to pee all the time. She was cold. She was hot. She was cold again. If this was what pregnancy was like, Lena wasn't sure she could handle it. And the nausea was unrelenting. Why did they call it morning sickness when it was more like all-day sickness?

Lena sat on a bench in front of the Target. She had to unzip her jacket because she'd started sweating at some point during the easy walk across the parking lot. She found a tissue in the pocket and blew her nose. She wasn't sure why her nose ran all the time now. Jared said she was making snot for two.

Lena checked the time on her phone. Sid Waller wasn't due for another forty minutes. She'd rest for a little while, then go back to the van. That is, if she didn't fall asleep first. Her eyelids felt heavy as she looked around the parking lot.

Lena found herself wondering if the world had always been filled with so many kids or if she was just seeing them now because she was pregnant. A toddler screamed as his mother pulled him toward the store. A child ran screeching around a minivan as his harried mom chased after him. Just outside the entrance to the store, another poor woman was bouncing a wailing baby on her hip.

Topping off this happy tableau was an extremely pregnant woman who was loading bags into the trunk of her car. Her belly was the size of a beachball. Sweat glued her hair to her head. She was parked in one of those expectant-mother parking spaces that Lena had always resented but now completely understood. The woman deserved to be closer to the door. She looked miserable. She dug her fist into her back as she unloaded the last bag from the cart. Her dress was way too tight. Even from a distance, Lena could see the thong sticking like dental floss between her ass cheeks.

"Jesus," Lena whispered. She felt like a cow glimpsing behind the counter at the butcher's shop.

Lena shivered. Her hands were cold. That's how it usually started. The change in temperature worked its way from the edges. She stuck her hands into her jacket pockets. Her fingers curled around the photo. Lena guessed the ultrasound could be called a photograph. At the very least, it was a snapshot of what was going on inside of her.

Over the years, Lena had looked at her share of X-rays and medical reports. She'd seen ultrasound pictures taped on refrigerators, shown on TV screens, and even presented as evidence in court cases where the mother had been murdered.

Lena had never been particularly moved by the images. To her, they were just black and white blobs. She assumed that the ability to ooh and ahh over the tiny splotches and weird folds was lost on her. Also, there was something disturbing about looking at a person's interior workings. Maybe Lena was a prude, but she couldn't be the only one thinking that showing an ultrasound was tantamount to showing the world irrefutable proof that you'd had sex.

But that was before Lena had seen an ultrasound of her own baby. Everything had changed two days ago. She couldn't understand it. How had that tiny, pulsing little bean opened up such a large space in her heart?

And how had it made Lena love Jared so much? She couldn't explain the shift. Loving Jared was nothing new, but the sudden depth of her feeling was terrifying. Lena had never felt this way about a man before. She was completely out of control, incapable of hiding her vulnerabilities. At night, she clung to him. During the day, she couldn't stop touching him. At first, Jared had been mildly annoyed. He generally wasn't up for touching unless it led to something, but he'd become more receptive over the last few weeks. There had to be some hormone Lena was giving off. Even the guys at work were looking at her differently.

Work.

Lena couldn't think about what would happen when she started to show. Not that she wasn't already. They probably just thought she was getting fat—which she was. Her pants cut into her waist. She spilled out of her bra. Jared was ecstatic about this particular development. All Lena could think was that there was no way she could chase after some thug with her breasts flopping around. In a few months, she'd probably end up stuck behind a desk. She'd be doing paperwork and following up on witness statements while everyone else had all the fun. Was it worth it?

Lena looked down at the ultrasound. She touched the tiny little bean resting in white crescent arms. Of course it was worth it.

Her phone vibrated in her jacket pocket. Denise Branson. She was probably pacing the station house waiting for news.

Lena said, "What's up, D?"

"Any news?"

Lena looked at the time. She should head back to the van. "He's got another thirty minutes, but he's always late."

"I'm already pushing back a meeting," Denise said. "You know it's both our asses on the line now."

"I know." Lena reluctantly pushed herself up from the bench. "I appreciate it."

"Listen." Denise seemed eager to move on. "I got another piece of the Big Whitey puzzle."

"Denise—"

"Just hear me out like I do with you, okay?" Lena owed her that much. "Okay."

"I found an article in the Savannah Tribune. Eighteen months ago, two white girls showed up dead behind a church. Runaways from good homes. Heroin overdoses, both of them. From honor students to stone-cold junkies in less than a month. The needles were still in their arms. That sound familiar?"

"Honor students OD on heroin all the time," Lena told her. "I could find a hundred other cases on the same day. Maybe thousands."

"It's just like what happened here."

There was no use arguing. "Denise, I'm saying this as a friend. You're obsessed with this. You're too close."

"So what if I am?"

Lena shook her head as she made her way back across the parking lot. Only in law enforcement was obsession considered an asset.

Denise said, "You're obsessed with Sid Waller."

"And I'm about to bust him," Lena countered. "I've got a case. I've got a witness. I've got leads, photos, timelines. All you've got is a ghost."

"You start out with all of that or did you put it together?"

Lena didn't want to admit she had a point. Before Mr. Snitch magically appeared, Denise could've been asking Lena the same questions about Waller. But she hadn't. She'd given Lena the support and time to do what she needed to do. "Did you track down that law firm?"

"I'm working on it. There's some kind of connection there."

"If you're right, then maybe we can help each other out. Sid Waller's the big man on campus. Once we take him down, he can give us Big Whitey."

Denise huffed a laugh. "You think Sid Waller's gonna turn? He's got just as much juice inside the joint as he does out."

She was right. The gangs ran the prisons and Waller would be a top dog. Still, she said, "It could happen."

"I'm not giving Waller any deals. He can rot away his sick ass in jail. I can get Big Whitey on my own."

Lena realized her fist was stuck in her back, just like the other pregnant woman. She dropped her hand. "All right. If you think you can put together a case, then you should get help. This is too big for one person. Two, if you count me, because you know I'm there for you."

Denise snorted. "You know I'm off-book. How am I gonna go to Lonnie for help when he told me to shut this down months ago? He's not gonna spend one dime of department money on Big Whitey. At least not until it's too late."

She was right again. By budgetary necessity, police forces were more reactive than preventative these days.

Lena had an idea. "I know somebody with the state who can give us a hand."

"I can't jump over Lonnie's head."

"I know that," Lena said. Gray was relatively new to Macon, but he'd spent the past fifteen years heading up forces all around the state. They both respected him too much to stab him in the back. Not to mention that when push came to shove, Gray could twist that knife right back in theirs. "You could reach out informally. I know an agent who's discreet." She didn't mention that the man had investigated her almost two years ago. "He's a cop, but he doesn't act like one. He'll give you the support you need. At the very least, he can help you put together some of these pieces."

"You think I'm gonna let the GBI come stomping onto my turf and taking credit?" She gave a harsh laugh. "You know how many hours I've put into this? How many miles on my car? How many sleepless nights? I've got blood in this fight, Lee. I'm not going to let go of it now."

Lena recognized the righteous indignation in her tone. Five years ago, Lena would've been saying the same thing, sounding the same way. She'd been so sure of herself before Jeffrey died. She was the one who was always right. She didn't need help. She didn't need some asshole trying to grab credit. Lena had taken on the world single-handedly every day—right up until the world knocked her flat on her ass.

Denise said, “If you’d talked to that girl, listened to her mama, then you’d feel the same way as me.”

“I know,” Lena said. She was glad she hadn’t spoken with either of them, otherwise she probably would’ve been sucked in right along with Denise. “You work the case. You don’t let the case work you.”

“What does that mean?” Denise shot back.

“This ghost you’re chasing—it’s affecting your life.”

“In what way?”

Lena didn’t answer. Denise wanted some bowling pins she could knock down. Lena knew from experience that the job wasn’t kind to lonely women. It could make you too driven. Too hard. It could scare people away from you.

Having Jared in her life had changed that for Lena. He’d shouldered some of the burden. He’d made her feel like it was okay to let go.

And then there was the baby. Lena put her hand to her stomach. Her face felt hot. An idiotic grin spread across her mouth. It was the hormones. She was glad she wasn’t in the van with Paul and DeShawn. She was probably fucking glowing.

“Come on, Adams,” Branson prompted. “Give it to me straight.”

Lena shrugged off the challenge. “Did you hear DeShawn’s getting divorced again?”

“And you think ’cause he’s black and I’m black that we’re a match made in heaven?”

“Please, he should be so lucky.” As hypocritical as it sounded, Lena told her, “I’m just saying that you can’t do both—be married to the job and married to a wife. What are you working for if you don’t have someone to come home to?”

Denise’s words were pointed. “You mean husband.”

The phone line was deadly silent. Denise Branson went to church every Sunday. She made the appropriate noises when a good-looking man walked by. But so had Lena’s sister, and Sibyl had been as gay as a three-dollar bill.

Denise was all business again. “Call me as soon as the meet’s over. If you can’t get Waller on tape, Lonnie’s gonna give us a come-to-Jesus talk. And I’m not gonna argue with him, because he’ll be right.”

“Denise, give me a break.”

“Don’t talk about break, girl, talk about broke. Do you know how much this is costing the department? Twenty-four-hour surveillance going on ten days. Overtime for everybody and their mother. We passed the half-million mark last weekend. I can’t even do the math on where we are now. I’ve been waiting for this meet to pan out so when I take it to Lonnie, he doesn’t kick my ass out the door.”

“I know you’re taking heat for me.”

“Shit,” Denise muttered. “I wish it was heat. I’m standing in a damn ring of fire.”

Lena was almost to the van. She glanced around, making sure she wasn’t being watched. “I’ll get Waller. I promise.”

“You don’t, then get a newspaper. We’re gonna both need to start looking for new jobs.” She let the phone slam down in Lena’s ear.

Lena slipped her hand back into her pocket. She traced the edge of the ultrasound as she walked toward the white van with the AT&T logo on the side. As far as she knew, no one had bothered to get clearance from the phone company. Lena figured they should shut up and take the free advertising.

“Hey, boss.” DeShawn came around the side of the van. He was so big he cast her completely in shadow.

Lena’s hand went to her throat. “You sure move light for a Mack truck.”

“That’s what the ladies say.” He winked at her. “You doing all right?”

Lena felt her defenses go up. “Why?”

He shrugged and shook his head. “No reason.”

“You take yourself off the monitors and stand out here waiting for me for no reason?”

He had the grace to admit he’d been caught. “I know this whole Waller thing’s been weighing hard on you.”

“Why? Has Lonnie said something?” Lena knew that DeShawn was Gray’s eyes and ears, but she’d never thought of him as a tattletale. “What did he say?”

“Nothing, and I didn’t say anything to him.” DeShawn looked at her like she was paranoid for no reason. “Come on, gal. You know I’m on your team.”

“What’s going on?” Lena asked. Now that she was looking at him, he seemed on edge, like something else was going on. "Why are you acting weird?"

DeShawn gave a heavy sigh. "I just noticed you've been tired lately."

"So? We're all tired. We've been butts to nuts for weeks."

He gave the sigh again. "I just wanted you to know that it's okay by me if you decide to take a back seat on—"

"Fuck your back seat," Lena snapped. "I've never taken a back seat on anything in my life."

"All right." He held up his hands. "Just worried about you, is all."

"Worried about me why?"

His mouth twisted to the side, like he was debating whether or not to tell her something. Lena knew DeShawn's sister had two girls. Maybe he'd figured out that Lena was pregnant. In which case, she had to shut this down fast.

She said, "Get your panties out of your cooch, Shawn. I appreciate your concern, but the best thing for both of us right now is for you to do your job and me to do mine. All right?"

He held up his hands in surrender again. "You're the boss."

She knocked on the side of the van. "It's me."

Eric Haigh cracked open the door. The whole gang was here. He told Lena, "We got a call from Waller's tail. He's about five minutes out."

Paul couldn't help but add, "I was right. He's probably coming early to case the restaurant."

Lena wasn't interested in giving credit. She started to hold out her hand for help, then decided it would be better to show DeShawn she was capable of moving her own weight. Still, she groaned as she pulled herself up.

DeShawn vaulted in without assistance, probably to prove a point. He slammed the door shut behind him.

"Jesus Christ." Lena clapped her hands over her face. The smell was disgusting. "What've you guys been doing in here?"

"Sorry," Eric said. "I had Mexican for lunch."

"Thanks a lot, dickslit." Paul punched him in the arm. Eric rewarded him with the wettest-sounding fart Lena had ever heard.

"Oh, God." She pinched her nose closed and breathed through her mouth. "Please tell me Snitch is still there."

Paul provided, "Mr. Snitchy is on the bench looking at the kiddies."

"Looking at them how?" Lena checked the monitor to see for herself. Snitch still had on his sunglasses. His arms were sprawled across the back of the bench. "Are you sure he's not asleep?"

"Look at his foot."

He was right. Snitch's heel was hopping up and down so fast the camera barely registered the movement. Lena asked, "Where's Mom?"

DeShawn was back in his chair. He pulled up the appropriate camera. The mother was still on the phone, stretched out in the booth as if she planned to stay there for a while.

"Good thing he's not a pedophile," Lena said. She motioned for Eric to get out of her chair.

Eric said, "The seat might be a little warm."

Paul laughed again, and she slapped him on the back of the head. "Why is everyone in this van an asshole except for me?"

Paul asked, "You okay, boss?"

Lena scowled at him. "Since when am I the boss?"

"You're in charge, right?" Paul indicated his empty chair. "What's going on with you? Your face is all red."

She put her hand to her cheek. The skin was hot. "It's probably gas poisoning."

"You sure about that?" He cocked an eyebrow at her, but he didn't push it.

"All right, ladies and Lena." DeShawn rubbed his hands together. "Mr. Waller has arrived."

A red Corvette idled in the parking lot. The windows were down. Sid Waller circled the lot twice before parking in a space by the road. He'd brought weight with him. Diego Nuñez was in the passenger seat. He had his arm resting on the door. A cigarette dangled from his fingers.

Eric squinted at the monitor. "Is that a joint?"

DeShawn checked it out. "Looks like it."

"Damn," Paul said. "Chick-fil-A don't like queers. What're they gonna do with a spic toking a doobie?"

"Shut up," Lena said. She tried to tune out their voices as she watched Sid Waller get out of the car. The metal chain on his wallet swung as he strutted across the parking lot. His long, skanky hair was pulled back in a ponytail. He wore ragged jeans and a flannel shirt with the sleeves ripped off. Tattoos covered both arms. Like Paul, he was incapable of just opening a door. He flung it open to announce his presence.

All four of them swiveled their heads in unison, watching the monitor that showed the lobby camera. Waller raised some eyebrows inside the restaurant, but this was Macon and it was hard to tell a harmless long-haired redneck from a violent one. The girls behind the counter figured it out quickly. Lena had always believed that women were better than men at spotting danger. It was why her gut wouldn't let go of the bad feeling she had about Mr. Snitch.

The junkie in question had noticed Waller's arrival. He sat up straight on the bench. His hand shot up in a wave. And then he kept waving, because Waller wouldn't look his way. Finally, Snitch stood up and went to the door. Instead of going inside, he motioned for Waller to join him on the playground.

Lena checked on the woman in the booth. The mother's jaw dropped when she saw Sid Waller.

DeShawn said, "Come on, Mama. Time to check on the kiddies."

Waller jerked open the door. Lena startled when his voice blared from the speaker in the van. "What the fuck, dumbass?" Snitch nervously looked at the kids.

Thankfully, their mother had scrambled to the door on the other side of the playground. They heard her strident tone on Snitch's concealed mic. "Britney. Randall. Now."

The children didn't have to be told twice. Sid Waller had a way of clearing a room.

"Move over," Waller said, and Snitch slid down the bench. "What're you doing here? I thought they didn't let faggots in this place."

Snitch chuckled like he was in on the joke.

"Shut up, pencil dick." Waller took a pack of cigarettes from his pocket. He shook one out, fumbled for his lighter.

Snitch looked around, checking all the corners.

"You worried about something?" Waller asked. He held the open flame of the lighter a few inches from his cigarette.

Snitch shook his head.

"Take off those fucking glasses."

Snitch took off his sunglasses.

Waller lit the cigarette. He inhaled half of it down before blowing out a long stream of smoke. "What are we doing here?"

"I got some more pills." Snitch reached for his pocket.

Waller stopped him with a look. "I look like a drug dealer to you?"

Snitch froze, his hand halfway in his pocket. They'd told him to pass the pills so at the very least, they'd have Waller on taking stolen narcotics.

Inside the van, they all tensed.

Eric said, "Look at him. He's freaking out."

He was right. Snitch was panicking.

Waller stood up to leave.

"Come on," Snitch said. "Don't be that way."

Instead of opening the door, Waller leaned against it. His arms crossed over his broad chest. The cigarette dangled from his mouth.

Lena held her breath. She watched the two men. They were having some kind of staring contest.

Unbelievably, Snitch won. Waller looked down as he tapped the ash off his cigarette.

Snitch said, "I wanna move up."

Waller put the cigarette back in his mouth.

"I can get more product."

"What makes you think I need it?"

Snitch stood up. He took off his ballcap and ran his fingers through his hair.

Lena asked, "Was that a signal?"

"I think he's just sweating," Paul said. "Look at the way he keeps pulling his pants away from his sac."

He was right. Snitch couldn't keep his hands off his crotch.

"Well?" Waller prompted. "You gonna make your case?"

Remarkably, Snitch remembered his lines. "I've gotta source at the hospital. I can get the good stuff. Name brand. Not that shit from China."

Smoke wafted up into Waller's eyes. He was thinking about it. Lena knew that he was thinking about it.

"Come on," she begged. Everyone in the van edged closer to the monitors. This was the make-or-break moment—maybe their only chance to get him.

Waller turned around and opened the door.

“Fuck.” DeShawn banged his fist against the table. The monitors shook. “I can’t believe he blew it.”

Snitch seemed to be thinking the same thing. He took off his hat again. “You’re a dumbass.”

Waller stopped.

Eric whispered, “Holy shit.”

“Shut up,” Lena ordered.

Waller was turning around. He didn’t speak until the door had closed.

“What’d you just call me?”

“I said you’re a dumbass.”

Lena felt her heart stop beating. Waller was coiled like a snake. They would have to peel him off Snitch before he killed him.

“You think I’m a dumbass?” Waller asked, like he wanted to be absolutely clear.

Instead of backing down, Snitch said, “I offer to double my deliveries, to give you top-notch product, and you walk away from me?” He took a step toward Waller, seemingly blind to the fact that he was taking his own life into his hands. “I want to move up, Sid. I been a good soldier, but I want to be a general one day.”

Waller seemed amused. “That so?”

“Yeah, that’s so.” Snitch jammed his hat back on his head. “I think I’ve earned some respect.”

Waller took out his cigarette pack again. He lit a fresh one off the old one. “What do I get out of this?”

“You know I’m an earner,” Snitch said. “You know I can do the dirty work.”

“Seems to me you like the dirty work.”

“You wanna get me wet?”

Waller didn’t answer, but Lena shook her head. Snitch was pushing it too far. He was asking if Waller wanted him to murder someone.

Waller flicked the old cigarette into the sandpit. “Let’s stick with what you know how to do. Double the order. Bring it to the house off Redding. We got junkies clawing at the door.”

DeShawn offered silent high fives all around. The shooting gallery was the house off Redding. They had their probable cause.

Snitch wouldn’t leave well enough alone. “When do you want it?”

“Soon as you can. Shipment’s late this week.” Sid puffed his cigarette. “We had a truck rolled in Miami. Cubans took two hundred K worth of Oxy.”

Snitch’s inner junkie took over. “I get payment on delivery. That’s the deal.”

Waller laughed. “Look at the big man giving orders.” He patted Snitch on the back so hard that Snitch almost fell into the swing set. “I go by the house at three every morning. Don’t be stupid and don’t be late.”

“Holy motherfucker.” Lena laughed incredulously as Sid Waller took his leave from the playground. “Ho-lee shit.”

Paul was laughing, too. “Grab your ankles, Waller. Get ready for the big pokey.”

Eric cut a bugle of a fart, which made the men laugh harder.

Lena groaned as she crawled past them to the front of the van. “You’re all disgusting.”

They were laughing too hard to hear her.

She plopped into the driver’s seat. She rolled down the window and filled her lungs with clean, fresh air. She prayed to God she wasn’t carrying a boy. Or worse, two boys. Twins ran in families. Dr. Benedict had told her they’d know for sure when he did the next ultrasound.

Lena took out her phone and pulled up Denise Branson’s number. She could see the Chick-fil-A building through the windshield. The distance was too great for detail, but she could tell that Snitch was still on the playground. He had returned to the bench, arms and legs spread wide. The sunglasses were back on. Lena couldn’t see his expression, but she gathered he was feeling pretty pleased with himself. He knew he was safe now. The minute he’d gotten Waller to talk about the house, Snitch’s immunity deal was set in stone.

Lena heard Denise Branson’s voicemail. She ended the call. Denise was probably in a meeting. Lena pulled up the text messaging and typed out a quick note: Baldy will have package within the hour.

Baldy was their nickname for the judge who kept telling them no. Lena was probably being paranoid, but she didn’t want to take the chance that her phone was hacked.

She checked over her shoulder. The men were still celebrating, trying to one-up one another with crass jokes about prison rape.

Lena rolled her eyes as she turned back around. Mr. Snitch was still on the playground bench. The sun was in his face. Kids were playing on the swings in front of him. He didn't have a care in the world.

She hated this part of the job. The junkie had been caught selling pills to kids, and he would go back to selling them pills because the police had let him go. There was no way for her to sit on him, wait for the inevitable fuckup. No criminal would ever deal with Lena again if they knew she couldn't be trusted. She would have to sit back and wait for Mr. Snitch to screw up on his own.

Or maybe she wouldn't.

Lena pulled up email on her phone. She selected the Google account that she used for ordering off the Internet. The email address could probably be traced back to her, but she didn't really care. She was going to take the advice she had just given Denise Branson. No cop should go it alone. There was no shame in asking for help. Besides, Mr. Snitch's immunity deal was with Macon, not the state of Georgia.

Lena couldn't touch Anthony Dell, but Will Trent could.

12.

FRIDAY

Will stumbled out of the hospital. Even outside, he could still hear Sara crying. Could feel the marks she'd left on his skin. Could smell her. Taste her.

He passed his bike, crossed the parking lot. His foot hit the curb. He stepped up, walking into the woods behind the building. Will didn't get far. He fell to his knees. He opened his mouth, tried to bring up the acid eating him inside.

What had he done?

He pressed his forehead to the cold ground. His mind kept flipping through the last twenty-four hours. All the violence. All the pain. What Will had seen. What he had wrought. Lena with the hammer. Tony with his knife. And then there was Sara.

What had he done to Sara?

He had lost her. In that one brutal moment, he had lost her forever.

"Hey, asshole!"

Will looked up. Paul Vickery was barreling toward him. Before Will could react, the man kicked him in the head.

Will slammed to the ground. Stars burst in front of his eyes. The air was knocked out of his chest.

Vickery jumped on him. He rained down punches like a windmill. Will bucked, trying to heave him off. Vickery grabbed Will's neck. The man put all of his weight into it, crushing Will's windpipe. Will tried to pry away his fingers. His mouth gaped open. Vickery pressed harder, strangling him. Will's tongue swelled. His eyes burned. He started to black out. Was this how it was going to happen? After all he had survived, was this how he was going to die?

Suddenly, the pressure stopped. Will gagged on the sudden rush of air.

Paul Vickery flew off him. He landed hard on the asphalt. His head thumped against the curb.

Will coughed so hard his feet kicked out.

“Are you okay?” Faith was there. She had a twenty-inch-long steel police baton in her hand. She asked Will again, “Are you okay?” She kept looking at Vickery, then back at Will. “Can you see me?”

Will saw two of her, then three.

Vickery tried to push himself up.

Faith slammed the baton into Vickery’s kidneys. Two brutal blows, one after the other.

“Bitch!” he screamed, writhing on the ground. “Jesus!” Faith jammed the baton in Vickery’s face. “Stay down.”

“He murdered a cop!”

The baton stayed in Vickery’s face. She drew her Glock on Will. “Get up.”

Will blinked at the gun. Her finger was on the trigger guard. He wasn’t sure he could move. He hurt so bad. Everything hurt so bad.

“Black,” Faith said. “I told you to get the fuck up.”

Black.

Will didn’t understand what she was saying. Was it some kind of a code?

“Up,” Faith repeated. She was using her cop voice, the one that said she had drawn down on a suspect before and was ready to do it again. “I said get the fuck up.”

Finally, Will’s brain managed to make contact with his arms, his legs. He pushed himself to sitting. The effort almost wasted him.

“Stay there,” Faith ordered, as if Will had a choice. “Bill Black, I’m placing you under arrest for parole violation.”

“Parole?” Vickery shouted. “He killed a fucking cop!”

“You got proof?” When Vickery didn’t offer an answer, she told Will, “You have the right to remain silent.”

Vickery muttered, “Stupid cunt.”

Faith talked over him. “Anything you say or do may be used against you in a court of law.”

Will leaned over and threw up. Peas. Something white. Green beans. He couldn’t remember eating any of it.

"You have a right to consult with an attorney."

Will sniffed. The sensation almost made him vomit again.

"If you cannot afford an attorney, one will be appointed for you by the courts."

"Okay." Will held up his hand for silence. The sound of her voice was an ice pick in his brain. "I waive my rights."

Faith holstered her Glock, but kept the baton at the ready. She tossed Will her handcuffs. "Put those on."

Vickery saw an opportunity. He tried to stand.

Faith flicked the baton, cracking it against Vickery's ankle. The sound was like a twig snapping.

"Bitch!" Vickery screamed in agony. "You fucking bitch!"

"Stand up." Faith grabbed Will's arm. She couldn't move him. "Come on." She leaned down to help. Her whisper in his ear felt like she was talking underwater. "Please."

From somewhere deep inside, Will summoned the strength to stand. He staggered like a colt taking its first steps. Faith wrapped her hand around his arm, pulled him toward the parking lot. He tripped over the curb again. Faith labored to keep him upright.

She coached, "Keep walking. Just keep walking."

Will tried to do as he was told. His feet were floppy, like the tendons had come undone. The ground looked strange. Everything was too large or too small. He was walking through a fun-house mirror. If not for Faith propping him up, he would've fallen flat on his face.

Paul Vickery wouldn't give up. "I got a witness puts him in the back room at Tipsie's tonight." He limped after them, keeping his distance. "Same place as the shooters who went after Lena."

Faith didn't answer. She pulled Will, urging him to go faster.

"Ask him where he went afterward," Vickery said. "Ask him where he was when my fucking team was being attacked."

Faith raised the baton in warning.

Vickery hung back. "I'll get him at the station."

"He's not going to the station." Faith leaned Will against a black Suburban. "I'm taking him to the field office. He's in state custody."

"You won't be able to hold him there."

Faith opened the back door. She kept her body turned toward Vickery as she tried to help Will into the seat. He was too heavy for her to manage. In the end, all Will could do was fall in.

“You’ll have to process him,” Vickery warned. “You send him to county, you send him to Fulton, I’ll get at him somehow.”

Will’s wrists were still cuffed. He clenched his stomach muscles so he could straighten up in the seat. The pain was excruciating. He opened his mouth. He was going to be sick again.

“Stay back, Vickery. I mean it.” Faith closed the door. She used the remote to lock it. The baton stayed out as she walked around the front of the Suburban.

“You’re dead, Black!” Vickery punched the door. He banged his fists against the glass. “You hear me? I will fuck you up!”

Will closed his eyes. Everything was spinning. The car kept shaking. Vickery was putting his shoulder into it, like he thought he could roll a five-thousand-pound vehicle.

“Back the fuck up!” Faith yelled. She was at the front of the car. She said something else, but Will’s hearing was going in and out. He heard Vickery call her every name a man could use against a woman. Faith cussed him right back, giving as good as she got.

The driver’s-side door opened.

Faith yelled, “Bet on it, cocksucker.” She slammed the door shut. The sound was like a cannon. The engine turned over. The car jerked as she put it in gear. The wheels squealed against pavement.

Will leaned forward. He rested his head on his knees. His hands were clasped together, trapped between his chest and legs. Spit and blood dripped from his open mouth. He waited for Faith to say something. To yell at him. To ask him what the hell he’d been doing.

She rolled down the windows a few inches. Will felt the cold night air swirl around him. He closed his eyes. Breathed through his mouth. The light grew softer. The tires hummed against the road.

Faith kept driving. She didn’t say a word. Didn’t even turn around.

Will’s breathing started to even out. Eventually, the nausea passed. Unfortunately, so did the numbness. His body came alive with pain. His nose felt broken. His eyelids throbbed. His lip was split. His neck felt as if it had been scraped with a razor, and his head pounded along with the beating of his heart.

Faith accelerated. They were on the highway. Will could tell from the steady, low grind of the engine. He didn't know how much time passed before she finally slowed for a turn. The sound inside the Suburban changed from a gentle hum to a fragmented crunch. The brakes squeaked as Faith slowed to a stop. She put the gear in park. The emergency brake clicked when she pushed down the pedal.

Faith opened the door. Will heard her walk around the car.

He pushed himself up. He had to move slowly. He winced at the pain in his head. His throat felt raw. He couldn't get the taste of blood out of his mouth.

The back door opened. Faith still didn't speak. She turned on the dome light. Will blinked, squinting. The handcuffs came off. Will rubbed his wrists, trying to get the circulation to come back. Faith opened the first aid kit from under the seat. She pulled out a roll of cotton squares, various packets, antibiotic ointment, Band-Aids. Will heard cars on either side of them. Faith had parked in a restricted area that cut across the highway median. Trees surrounded them. Broken beer bottles and used condoms littered the ground.

She said, "Look at me."

Will turned his head toward her. He closed his eyes. Packets were ripped open. Alcohol wipes. Disinfectant. He kept his eyes shut as Faith tended his scrapes and cuts. She was efficient if not gentle. Will was grateful. Sara had doctored him before. She always touched him so softly. She caressed him, kissed the places she said needed extra help to heal.

Faith wiped underneath his eyes with a tissue.

Will parted his lips to help get more air in his lungs. He wanted to thank her, to acknowledge how much her silence meant to him. Faith had always been a bull in the china shop of his life. Will was too broken now to tell her what had happened with Sara tonight.

Faith scrubbed at the blood around his nose. She said, "Eric Haigh is dead."

"I know." Will could barely speak. He tried to clear what felt like a wad of cotton trapped in his esophagus.

Faith said, "We found the body an hour ago."

"His front yard," Will whispered. "I helped Tony Dell put him there."

Faith's hand stopped.

Will opened his eyes. "I watched him kill him. Tony Dell kill Eric." Will coughed. The cotton had turned into razors. "It was at Tipsie's. Hunting knife. Dell wears it in his boot. Wore it." Will tried to swallow, but his throat refused. "We threw the knife in the river. I don't know which one. Concrete bridge. No houses around."

"We'll find it."

"You need to find Tony."

"He's gone. His house is empty. His car's still in the impound lot." Faith tore open a packet of antibiotic. "He used his ATM card to clean out his bank account." She squeezed some ointment onto a Q-tip. "We've got a BOLO on him."

Will still couldn't swallow. There was only an empty clicking noise. "Three men were there. Rednecks. Big guys. Fat." Will couldn't remember whether or not he'd told her where this had happened. "At Tipsie's. That's where Tony killed Eric Haigh."

She dabbed the Q-tip to his forehead. "I'll put somebody on the club."

"They were in the back room. Dell took me there to meet them. I didn't know until we were inside that that's what he wanted."

Faith squirted more ointment onto the Q-tip.

"They knew my Bill Black cover. All of it. They were watching me. Not when I went back to Atlanta—they couldn't follow me on my bike—but they knew about the hotel, my habits." Will felt in his pocket for his phone. He looked down at the shattered glass.

Sara had thrown her phone against the wall. Will had watched it break into pieces. He had never seen her throw anything like that before.

Faith asked, "Will?"

His phone was in his hand. The glass was shattered. Will slid it back into his pocket. "One of them was called Junior." He finally managed to swallow. The pain nearly made him pass out. "He had a gun to my chest. Pearl-handle Smith and Wesson. The knife had a pearl handle. The redneck's, not Tony's. We threw that off a bridge."

Faith ringed the Q-tip underneath Will's eye. He remembered the redneck cutting him; the first cut of the night.

He said, "My clothes are in a trash bag in my locker. I had to change, take a shower. Tony was in the ER. He cut his hand when he stabbed Haigh. They had to stitch it up." He felt the need to add, "I don't know how many stitches."

Faith said, "His wife found him."

"Tony has a wife?"

"Eric Haigh. His wife found his body outside the house. There was a lot of confusion at first. She didn't recognize him."

Will remembered, "They told us to put him on the front lawn. The order came from Big Whitey." He saw the question in her eyes. "On the phone. I didn't meet him. The redneck took the call, then he told Dell where to dump the body, that the order came straight from Big Whitey."

"We'll see if we can trace the call to the club."

"It was a cell, probably a burner."

"We'll check it anyway." Faith tossed the Q-tip into the first aid box. The cotton was soaked red. She told Will, "Haigh'd been missing for two days. His wife didn't say because he'd been acting weird since the raid. She knew Internal Affairs was involved. She didn't want to get him into trouble."

"The raid," Will repeated. Faith had talked about it earlier, but Will couldn't recall the conversation. "They tortured him."

"I know."

"The redneck told Dell ..." He lost his train of thought. "What did I say?"

"The redneck told Dell?" She tried, "We were talking about Eric Haigh."

The prompt didn't help. "He said he'd be in touch with me. That he had a job for me."

"What time were you at the club?"

"Time?" The question didn't make sense. "What time?"

Will took his phone out of his pocket. The glass was shattered. Still, the screen came on when he pressed the button. He told Faith, "It's 1:31 a.m."

Faith tilted his head back up so she could look at him. "Should I take you to the hospital? A different hospital, I mean."

Will shook his head. He wasn't going to any hospital.

"I think you have a concussion."

"Why?"

"Paul Vickery kicked you in the head."

"When?" Will asked, but that wasn't the right question. He knew Vickery had kicked him. "I mean, why was Paul at the hospital?"

"Someone took a shot at him." Faith made herself more clear. "Paul Vickery was at the hospital because someone tried to kill him tonight."

"I'm sorry I keep forgetting things."

"It's all right." Faith spoke more slowly than necessary. "Vickery was at home. A gunshot was fired through a front window at his house. That's why he had the bandage on his arm."

Will couldn't remember seeing a bandage. "Is he okay?"

"Okay enough to attack you." She frowned. "He fights like a woman. You've got scratches on your neck." Faith turned his head. "Did he bite you?"

Will looked away. Paul Vickery hadn't made those marks. Sara had scratched him. She'd kicked him and bitten him and Will hadn't stopped because everything she did only made him want to fuck her harder.

Faith gave up on the Q-tip. She smeared antibiotic onto her finger and rubbed it on Will's face. "They went after DeShawn Franklin, too. He was jumped outside a movie theater tonight. His girlfriend started screaming. She called 911."

"They took him to the hospital?"

"Will, look at me." She made sure she had his attention. "Someone went after Franklin and Vickery on the same night that Eric Haigh's body was dumped on his front lawn."

Will already knew these details, but the way she put them together so succinctly finally made them click. "It was coordinated."

"Right. Someone was sending a message." She peeled open a Band-Aid.

"That's what the redneck said—there's no use sending a message unless everybody can read it."

"Well, if you ever see him again, tell him the message was received loud and clear. Turn that way."

Will turned his head. Faith stuck the Band-Aid on his neck to cover the scratches.

He asked, "Is that why you were at the hospital? Because they were all attacked?"

"I was looking for you."

"Because of DeShawn Franklin." Will shook his head. That was wrong. "You went to the hospital because of Eric Haigh. You saw him and you thought they had done the same thing to me."

"I thought he was you," Faith said. "His own wife didn't recognize him. I went to the hospital thinking I was going to have to identify your body."

"I'm sorry."

"Thank God Sara wasn't answering her phone." She indicated for him to look up again. The scratches were too wide for just one Band-Aid. "It was a real party after that. Paul Vickery and DeShawn Franklin were wheeled in right as I was coming up from the morgue. I was talking on the phone to Amanda."

"Did you have to tell them Haigh was dead?"

"Yes," Faith answered, her voice straining. "But then they saw Tony Dell getting his hand sewn up and decided to take it out on him." She didn't make Will ask. "It took six cops to get them off the guy."

"Why'd they go after him?"

"I guess because Dell's car was parked outside Lena's house the night they were attacked. I'm sure whoever Vickery's witness is who saw you at the club also saw Tony. It's not a leap to think you both had something to do with Haigh's murder."

It wasn't a leap because it was right. "What's Tony saying?"

"Who knows?" Faith sounded exasperated. "I told you five seconds ago that it took six cops to peel DeShawn and Vickery off Tony Dell. By the time anybody thought to look, Dell was gone. We turned the hospital upside down, but he managed to get away."

"He probably had ten escape routes already planned." Will remembered something. He took out his wallet. Cayla Martin's handwritten note was still in the photo sleeve. "This is Tony's stepsister. Check her house."

Faith took the note with some skepticism. "Dell didn't have any siblings on his background check."

"It was only a few years," Will said. "He's in love with her."

Her look said she was considering the hospital again.

"I know it sounds weird, but it's true. She's a nurse at the hospital."

"I'll send a car."

Will coughed. He looked at his palm, expecting to find blood. "Vickery called me a cop killer."

Faith shook her head like she didn't understand it, either. "Maybe he saw you leaving Eric Haigh's house?" She answered herself. "No, if he saw you leaving Haigh's, he would've killed you in the street. Do you remember seeing Vickery tonight? Or any of them?"

Will considered the question. He could feel it roll around in his brain like a marble that wouldn't settle. Faith said, "I'm going to call Sara."

"Don't."

"She has a right to—"

"No." Will grabbed her arm. He let go just as quickly. "She knows everything."

Faith examined his face. He wondered what she saw. The bruises wouldn't show for a few hours. The side of Will's head probably had a print from Paul Vickery's shoe. The bridge of his nose would be red. His split lip would show blood. The scratch mark. The bite mark. What would she make of those?

She said, "We need to get to the field office."

Will wanted to go back to Atlanta. He had to get his dog from Sara's apartment. His toothbrush, the clothes he'd left in the drawers she'd cleared out for him. She shouldn't have to see any reminders of Will. It was the least he could do.

"It's over," he told Faith. "With Sara. It's over."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes." Will had never been so sure of anything in his life.

Faith closed the first aid kit. She clicked the plastic lock. "Well, that's her loss."

"She has good reason."

"No, she doesn't," Faith insisted. "No matter what you did, Sara's not the woman I thought she was if she can't forgive you."

Will held his tongue. She would find out the truth soon enough.

Faith said, "Get in the front seat. We're going to be late."

"For what?"

"Branson." Faith's tone made Will think maybe she'd said this before. "I saw her at the hospital. She's ready to talk."

"Why now?"

"Somebody tried to take out two of her detectives—three if you count Lena. Eric Haigh was tortured and stabbed to death. Jared Long was almost murdered. Hell yes, she's going to talk to us. She's getting her files. We're supposed to meet at the field office." Faith looked at her watch. "Ten minutes ago."

"What files?"

“The ones from the shooting gallery.” Faith motioned for Will to move. “Denise Branson has been lying to us all along. She’s finally going to show us her files from the raid.”

Will stared into the bathroom mirror at the GBI field office, assessing his damaged face. Life had left him a wound expert. He knew the difference between a cut that scarred into a thin white line and a cut that left nothing but a faint memory. By his estimation, the only lasting reminder of the night would come from the redneck’s knife. The tiny slice below Will’s eye probably should’ve had at least one stitch. But that had to be done at a hospital, and Will was never going to another hospital ever again.

At least the nausea had passed. His head was aching at a lower frequency. The trembling had stopped, which he took as a good sign that he wasn’t having a stroke or a seizure. Swallowing was still an issue. He found this out the hard way when Faith made him drink two bottles of Coke. Then she’d stood over him while he choked down a pack of cheese crackers. Will had gotten irritated at her for bossing him around, which probably meant that whatever she was doing was working.

He looked at his neck, lightly touching the reddish bruises that were starting to come up. If Will had one talent, it was surviving. He’d made it through the night. The redneck hadn’t done too much damage. Tony Dell hadn’t killed him, though he was obviously capable. Paul Vickery had gotten in many, many good blows, but Faith had probably cracked his ankle, which was a nasty enough payback.

So, Will had survived. He had a right to feel good about that.

But then there was Sara.

When Will was a kid, he’d imagined all the slings and arrows thrown his way were easily portable. He didn’t have to keep them inside. He could shove them all into boxes. After a while, there were a lot of boxes. There was nowhere to put them. They floated over his bed at the children’s home. They followed him to school. They chased after him like bullies when he ran down the street.

As Will got older, storage became an issue. Or maybe the metaphor evolved alongside him. The floating boxes turned into pieces of paper. The papers went into files. The files were put in filing cabinets. The cabinets were locked so that he never had to see them again.

When Sara came into his life, Will forgot about the file room. He forgot about the endless pieces of paper. The rusted cabinet locks that wouldn't turn sometimes.

That was over now.

Standing in the bathroom, Will put Sara Linton into a file and closed the drawer.

"Will?" Faith knocked lightly at the door. "Are you okay?"

He turned on the faucet to let her know he was alive. The water was icy cold. He wanted to splash some onto his face, but the liquid would probably roll right off. Faith had used so much antibiotic ointment that his skin glistened.

Will opened the door. Faith was standing there with a bottle of water in each hand.

His voice sounded like an old man's. "Scared I'd die on the toilet?"

"That's not funny."

"It can happen," he croaked. "I read about it in the paper."

She handed him the water. "You weren't sick again?"

"No." He regretted the loss of her previous silence, but he wasn't cruel enough to tell her. "I'm fine. Thank you."

"Drink all of that water." She led him down the hall. "I sent a cruiser for a knock-check on Cayla Martin's house. Took them forever to find the place. It's not on MapQuest, Google, anything."

Will nodded. He would've never found the road without Tony's help.

"Anyway, the point is they eventually found it. Martin was home. She said Tony Dell could go to hell for all she cared. And then she asked if there was a reward for helping to find him."

Will nodded again. That sounded like Cayla Martin.

"The cruiser's gonna swing by a few more times before they go off shift to make sure Dell doesn't show up. Meanwhile, I caught up Amanda on everything that happened tonight. We're trying to Skype her into the conference room, but there are some technical difficulties."

Will assumed the problems weren't on this end.

"Lonnie Gray is here. The Macon chief of police."

"Amanda called him?"

"Denise Branson did. My hat's off to her for manning up to the boss. They're outside talking while we try to get the feed up. And by talking, I mean Denise is mostly listening to him screaming. Gray's so far up her ass he's probably in her gallbladder by now."

Will took a sip of water. "She lose her job?"

"If she's lucky, that's all she'll lose. Gray had no idea Branson was lying to us. She could be looking at obstruction charges or worse." Faith glanced over her shoulder. "I haven't told Gray what Vickery did to you yet."

Will shook his head. "Don't. I'll settle it with Vickery."

"You'll have to beat Amanda to it. She's ready to scalp him."

Will kept shaking his head. "I wish you hadn't told her."

"Yeah, well, I wish I hadn't lost my virginity during a midnight screening of Die Hard. Get over it." Faith pushed open the door.

The conference room was eerily similar to just about every other conference room at every other GBI field office in the state. Fake oak paneling covered the walls. A long table split the center of the room. Worn pleather office chairs were crammed so tight that two large men couldn't comfortably sit by each other. A small plasma television was on top of a rolling metal cart. Wires hung down to the various electronics on the shelf below. The screen showed what was obviously Amanda's personal Skype photo. The image had to be from the 1980s. She was dressed for tennis. A wooden racket rested on her shoulder. A Jane Fonda headband poofed out her hair. She was smiling, which was probably the most disconcerting part.

Amanda's voice squawked from the speaker on the table. "Can you see me waving my hand?"

"No, ma'am." Agent Nick Shelton, head of the field station, didn't touch the laptop in front of him. Instead, he jammed his fingers into his eyes as he shook his head. "I'm trying everything I can. Are you sure it's not on your end?"

"Yes, I'm sure," Amanda snapped. "I can't see anything but the GBI logo. There's no video at all."

Nick shook his head at Faith. He held out his hand to Will.

"Agent Trent."

"Is Will there?" Amanda asked. "I can't see a thing."

Will tried to make his voice as strong as he could. "Yes, ma'am."

"Why are you whispering?"

Faith said, "Because he was nearly strangled to death."

Amanda showed her usual concern. "Sit close to the speaker, then. I don't want to have to ask you to repeat yourself every two minutes."

"Yes, ma'am."

"I'm going to have a word with that idiot who set up my computer," Amanda complained. "He's been out here three times, and it stops working the minute he leaves."

Faith couldn't help herself. "You know you can catch more flies with honey."

"Yes, Faith, thank you. That's exactly what I need is more flies."

Will slumped into a chair as the two women exchanged more helpful suggestions. The table was set up for a formal meeting. Five bottles of water were in front of five chairs. Notepads and pens were laid out beside them. Will had been at a lot of briefings where a lot of cops lost their jobs, but he felt sorry about this one. Denise Branson had made a career-ending mistake, but she'd probably done it for reasons she felt were right.

It was just a matter of time before Lena Adams did the same.

Will looked at the digital clock on the wall: 3:01 in the morning. He should be exhausted. Maybe the caffeine in the Cokes had sparked him up. Or maybe his body had finally accepted the fact that he was going to live.

He stared at the water bottles Faith had shoved into his hands. One was about a quarter empty. Will's mouth was bone-dry, but just thinking about taking another drink made his throat hurt. He felt like he was drowning in the ocean.

The door opened. Nick stood up. "Ma'am, Chief Gray and Major Branson have entered the room."

Denise Branson was no longer in her shiny uniform. She wore jeans and a loose-fitting blouse. Her previously erect posture was gone. There was something beaten down about her. The leather briefcase was the only indication that she was the same woman they'd talked with in Atlanta yesterday morning.

For his part, Lonnie Gray was decked out in full regalia. His gold epaulets glimmered in the overhead light. He carried his hat under his arm. He was older, but had the look of a guy who started his day with a hundred push-ups before the sun came up. He also looked furious as hell. His mouth was a barely visible white line under his mustache. His forehead was furrowed like a plowed field.

They all shook hands. Will stayed in his chair, hoping they would understand.

“Chief Gray,” Amanda said. “I’m sorry for the technical difficulties. I’m doing the Skype program from my home.”

Will didn’t know which was worse, the photo of Amanda playing tennis or the thought of her talking to them in her nightgown.

“That’s fine.” Lonnie Gray sat across from Will. He did a double take. So did Denise Branson. She slowly sank into the chair beside her chief, lips parted in surprise.

Will guessed he was going to have to get used to people staring at him for a while.

Nick said, “Ma’am, we’re all seated.”

“Thank you,” Amanda said. “Lonnie, my condolences on your son. I hadn’t heard that he passed away.”

“Thank you.” Gray obviously didn’t want to talk about his personal life. He quickly got down to business. “Mandy, I want to apologize to you, your agents, and your agency for the actions of one rogue officer. Rest assured, my house will be put in order.” He shot Branson a look. “Starting now.”

“I appreciate that, Lonnie.” Amanda didn’t sound like she appreciated it at all. “Major Branson, I need to inform you that because you are officially under investigation, this conversation is being recorded. Anything you say may be used against you. You’re entitled to an attorney—”

“I don’t need an attorney,” Branson said, though they all knew she did. “Give me the form.”

Nick was prepared. He pushed a sheet of paper over to Branson so she could officially acknowledge that she’d been Mirandized.

Branson didn’t read the form. She’d probably seen it thousands of times. She clicked the pen and signed her name on the line before pushing the paper back toward Nick.

Lonnie Gray gave her a nod to begin.

Branson didn’t start immediately—not because she was playing games again, but because she probably knew this was the last briefing she would ever give.

Finally, she took a deep breath and jumped in. “Approximately three and a half weeks ago, Detective Adams came to me about a suspected shooting gallery off Redding Street. I authorized her to investigate. She monitored the house for a few days and determined the intelligence was good.” Branson paused. She started playing with the ballpoint pen, balancing it between two fingers. “During the course of surveillance, Detective Adams realized that the shooting gallery was being run by a man named Sidney Waller.”

Gray took over. “Waller’s an extremely violent, high-level drug runner. When I came in two years ago, my number one priority was capturing and prosecuting him. Even with the full force of the department behind it, we were never able to make any charges stick.”

Will thought it was pretty decent of the man to acknowledge his failure.

Branson seemed to appreciate it, too. She nodded at him before continuing. “We knew we could shut down the shooting gallery pretty quickly, but with Sid Waller involved, we saw an opportunity. I spoke with Detective Adams and decided that we should expand the operation with the goal of capturing and convicting Waller.”

Gray provided, “This was where I came in. We got the DA on our side, formed an intra-agency task force. There were a lot of moving pieces. Denise and I had to coordinate together.”

Will saw Branson flinch when he used her first name rather than her rank. Still, she said, “We were ten days into the operation when we realized that catching Waller was unlikely. We couldn’t turn anyone. People were terrified of him. The junkies went to ground. No one would wear a wire. It was looking like we would have to go into the house and settle on rounding up whomever we could find. We could time it so Waller was there, but that wasn’t much of a consolation.”

Amanda said, “Because you couldn’t prove that Waller was in charge, he’d bond out with the rest of the junkies.” She sounded impatient. “But obviously, something changed?”

Branson said, “Detective Adams was contacted by a confidential informant. He was in lockup for selling pills to Mercer students. Not on campus, but at one of the coffee shops.”

The distinction was important. Sale or distribution of illegal substances inside a school zone jacked up the prison time exponentially.

Amanda asked, “This was one of Adams’s usual CIs?”

“No, she’d never met him before. He was locked up less than two hours, and he asked for her by name.” Branson added, “Adams has a reputation with the junkies around town. This wasn’t necessarily a red flag.”

Amanda’s brain was working faster than Will’s. “The snitch was Tony Dell?”

Branson hesitated. “Yes, ma’am. He told her that he would trade Sid Waller for immunity off the drug deal.”

Will glanced at Faith. At least now they knew why Lena had sent Will the email. She didn’t want Dell to skate.

Amanda told Branson, “You got Waller on tape, which gave you probable cause for an arrest warrant?”

“Yes,” Branson confirmed. “We commenced the raid four days later. The snitch said a big shipment was coming in. Detective Adams and her team breached the house. They found this.” She nodded to Nick.

He tapped some keys on the laptop and Amanda’s tennis shot was replaced by a crime scene photo.

Will stared at the screen. Two dead men. Hispanic. Shirtless. They were sitting on a tattered old couch. Their throats were slit open.

Nick asked Amanda, “Can you see it, ma’am?”

“Yes.”

Branson said, “The one on the right is Elian Ramirez, an Oxy freak who was at the wrong place at the wrong time. The guy on the left is Diego Nuñez. He was Waller’s right-hand man. Professional thug. He spent his twenties inside for manslaughter coupled with time-plus for bad behavior.”

Branson nodded for the next photo, and Nick slid over the laptop so she could do it herself.

Branson narrated the next picture, which showed a man with the top of his skull chopped off. “Thomas Holland. He’s new to the scene, got hooked on crack his senior year. We don’t know why he was there except to get high. He was taken out with an ax.” A picture of Holland’s scalp flashed up, then his face from another angle. He was young, probably seventeen. Blond hair, piercing blue eyes. Except for the missing part of his head, he could’ve been on a poster for a Disney movie.

Branson flashed through some more innocuous photos, showing stills of the bedrooms, the bathroom, the dining room. Will had been inside shooting galleries before. The scene was familiar: crack pipes and needles scattered on the floor, mattresses in every room. He never understood where the mattresses came from, or why someone who was shooting poison into their veins required a comfortable place to pass out.

“Here.” Branson stopped on a photo. It showed an open basement door. There were metal braces on each side. A two-by-four was on the floor.

She said, “The basement. This is where Sid Waller was hiding.”

Will wondered if his head was still messed up. If someone locked you in a basement, you weren’t hiding. You were trapped.

Branson said, “Two detectives breached the basement. Mitch Cabello and Keith McVale.”

Faith stiffened. They both recognized the detectives’ names. McVale had taken leave from his job and Cabello had been admitted to the hospital the day of the raid.

Branson said, “Detectives Adams and Vickery stayed in the kitchen. Cabello and McVale called the all-clear on the basement. They relayed to Detective Adams that they’d found a large amount of money. We believe it was shortly after this that Sid Waller came out from his hiding place.”

She pulled up the next photo, which showed a hanging piece of wall paneling with a dark, wet hole behind it that someone had dug into the earth. The photo was not great, but Will could tell the hole was deep enough to hide a grown man.

“Waller knocked out Cabello with a strike to the head. He then took McVale hostage—quietly. Shortly after, Detective Adams went downstairs to help secure the money. She walked into the hostage situation. She drew on Sid Waller, who had a gun to McVale’s head. There was a standoff. Rather than being taken in by Detective Adams, Waller shot himself in the head.”

Will silently replayed her words, which were wholly unexpected. He managed, “Sid Waller shot himself?”

“All three detectives told exactly the same story.” She held up her hands, stopping the obvious question. “The crime scene techs support every word of their statements. The autopsy confirmed the wound was self-inflicted. The tox screen showed there were enough pills in Waller to make a Buddhist monk go postal. At no point do the facts diverge. Everything says Waller took his own life.”

Amanda wanted a second opinion. "Lonnie?"

Gray stirred in his chair. "Our snitch recorded Waller referring to a breakdown in supply. One of his trucks was rolled by some Cubans down in Miami. I made a call to some contacts I still have down in Florida. Waller was on the verge of a war with the Cuban cartel."

Branson said, "Sid knew he wouldn't last more than a day in prison. Better to eat a bullet than take a shiv from some Cuban in the yard."

Amanda moved them along. "Where does Big Whitey fit into all of this?"

Gray looked at Branson. He seemed sad, like one of his children had disappointed him.

She told them, "I was working the case off-book. Chief Gray told me not to pursue it, even on my own time, but I was obsessed with tracking Big Whitey down."

Amanda asked, "This is connected to Waller?"

"Tangentially," Branson conceded.

"Is there a reason you're not taking us down that tangent?"

Branson reached into her briefcase again. She took out a file that was several inches thick. Then she took out another one. Then another one. She stacked them on the table.

Faith wasn't shy. She grabbed the whole pile and slid it toward her.

Branson said, "Big Whitey came onto my radar eighteen months ago. I like statistics. I like to run the numbers, track the crimes, see where we need to move people around to stop the bad guys." She paused. Will could tell she had just realized she wasn't going to get to do this anymore.

"Anyway," Branson said, "it's what you said yesterday, the same thing that happened in Savannah and Hilton Head. It felt like there was a larger, organizing factor. Our usual lowlifes were stepping up. There's a law firm here they all use, ambulance chasers, sloppy and cheap. Suddenly, they merged with a white-shoe firm out of Florida."

"Vanhorn and Gresham." Faith looked up from the report she was reading. "The shooter who went after Jared Long is represented by the firm."

"Correct," Branson said. "We started seeing low-level cons like Fred Zachary walking on solid charges because of these guys. I started talking to folks, meeting with my detectives, and figured out there was a new player in town.”

Faith said, “Big Whitey.”

“Correct,” Branson repeated. “Whitey started out banking legit through a series of pain management clinics. It’s the usual deal. They were using junkies to cash the scripts. Rednecks, mostly. They control the meth trade, so it was natural for Whitey to tap into an existing market.”

Gray felt the need to explain himself. “I wasn’t persuaded Big Whitey existed. There were some sketchy details from Florida, but no name, no description, no affiliation. He was a ghost.” Gray shrugged. “And we had a lot going on at the time. There was a rash of heroin overdoses at one of our private schools. Young women from good homes. Not the type we were used to seeing in that situation.”

“Rich white girls,” Faith supplied, skipping the political correctness. “They die or just end up at the hospital?”

Branson said, “Three died. Six went to the ER, then got carted off to white-girl prison.” She meant rehab. “They were from some of our better-known families. There was a lot of heat to make arrests. Like I said, Whitey was running pills through rednecks. Most of our non-pharmaceutical dealers were black and Hispanic. It’s easy to spot who’s working for whom.”

Faith put it more succinctly. “So, the white people freaked out and demanded justice. You arrested a bunch of blacks and Hispanics.” She used sarcasm to make her point. “I’m sure that went over well.”

Gray was obviously uncomfortable with Faith’s directness, or maybe he was more conscious that the conversation was being recorded. “We arrested the dealers who were known to sell heroin. My department is not in the business of racial profiling and never will be.”

Will assumed from Gray’s tone that he’d faced these accusations before. Atlanta had enough political scandals of its own to fill the local news, but Will had a vague recollection of seeing some reports about the mayhem down in Macon. Lonnie Gray must’ve gone to work every day wondering if he was going to keep his job.

Branson spoke reluctantly. “Because of the clampdown, we crippled Whitey’s competition in the streets. We created a racial firestorm that split apart the city and made all the politicians start screaming for blood.”

Gray admitted, “That’s when I shut down Denise’s investigation. We had too much going on to waste resources on a man we weren’t even sure existed.”

“This—” Will tried to clear the squeak from his voice. “This was Big Whitey’s endgame? To take over the heroin trade?”

Branson answered, “He took over everything. Remember, chess, not checkers. He comes into town and makes friends, pays up the food chain to guys like Sid Waller so that everybody stays happy. Whitey has operating capital. He opens up some pain clinics, gets his regulars, puts the junkies on his payroll so they start dealing. Then he spreads out his business to the malls, into the suburbs. He gets the kids with money hooked, then when they want something more, he moves them on to heroin.” She shook her head, though he could tell part of her was impressed. “Once his business model’s up and running, he starts taking out the competition.”

Amanda asked, “You know this is a pattern how?”

“Because I drove to Savannah and talked to some retired detectives who were too scared to tell me this over the phone.”

Gray’s clenched fists indicated he was just hearing this. He shot Branson a withering look.

Will couldn’t let go of something. He asked, “Chief Gray, you didn’t think Whitey existed?”

Gray reluctantly turned his attention away from Branson. “We’re not used to this level of sophistication in our criminal underworld. Mandy, you know I’ve worked all over the state, but this is more like something you’d see out of Miami or New York.”

There was a big fish/little pond logic to Whitey taking on the smaller cities. He’d also managed to pick two areas in Georgia where the population was predominantly African American. It was as if he was franchising his business model.

Will asked Branson, “Major, why were you so sure Whitey existed?”

“May I?” Branson was talking to Faith. She wanted one of her file folders back.

“Help yourself.” Faith pushed the stack back across the table.

Branson flipped through one of the files until she found a photograph. She put it on the table. The young girl in the picture was pretty and blonde, posing for the camera in that seductive way that teenage girls don't know is dangerous.

Branson said, "Marie Sorensen. Sixteen years old. She worked at a cheese shop in River Crossing, one of our upscale malls. Lots of bored suburban kids hang out there. Sorensen's by far the prettiest. She managed to catch Big Whitey's eye."

Nick told Amanda, "I'll scan it in for you."

"Don't bother." Amanda guessed, "Big Whitey got Sorensen hooked on heroin?"

"He got her into his car." Branson took out another photo, this one showing Sorensen looking ten years older and twenty pounds lighter. Both eyes were bruised. There were open sores on her face. Patches of hair were missing from her head.

Branson said, "Another one of Big Whitey's patterns, but this one he does himself because he enjoys it." She put the pictures side by side on the table. "He tells them that he works for a modeling agency. They buy it because they've been told they're beautiful all their lives. He gets them to the car, forces them into the trunk, then drives them to a hotel on the coast—Tybee, Fort King George, Jekyll. He rapes them. His friends rape them. He shoots them up with heroin. He tricks them out."

Branson paused. She looked away from the photos.

"Sorensen was defiant at first. He put her in a dog crate to teach her a lesson. Took about a week to break her, then he put her up for sale on the Internet. One-sixty for the lunchtime special, two-fifty for an hour. Four hundred for two hours. She does ten, fifteen clients a day. Her habit runs a couple hundred dollars. Not a bad business model. Do the math."

Faith stared straight ahead. She couldn't look at the photos, either. Will wondered if she was thinking about her daughter.

Will asked, "What happened to her?"

Branson said, "Sorensen got old real quick. That's the problem with these young girls. They don't stay young for long. After two months, she was moved to the next stop on the circuit. That's what these guys do—they move them around, never let them get settled in one place."

She paused again. The pain was obviously still fresh. "Eventually, the girls get sent out to California, where they're tricked out on the streets. Sorensen ended up in LA. She managed to call her mom a few times, tell her what happened. Mom hired a private detective to try to find her.”

Faith asked, “She didn’t file a report in Macon? The girl was sixteen years old.”

Branson’s face told the story. This was the ball she had dropped. This was why she was so obsessed with the case. “We filed a missing persons report when she disappeared. When the mom told me about the phone calls, I reached out to LA. They told me it was a lost cause. They’ve got so many girls streaming into the city that they had to close the Hollywood bus station.”

Faith smoothed her lips together like she was putting on lipstick.

Branson slid out another photo. Will recognized the tiny ruler beside Marie Sorensen’s head as the kind that medical examiners used during autopsies.

She said, “The private dick in LA tracked down an address. The police searched the apartment three times before they found her. She was crammed into a suitcase underneath the bed. Still alive.” Branson let out a slow breath. “Still alive.”

She looked down at the autopsy photo. No one pushed her to go on.

Branson took another deep breath.

“Mom got the first plane out to California. Marie’s in the hospital for three weeks. They patch her back together, get some weight on her, take her down off the heroin, only they can’t heal her brain. Two weeks after mom gets her home, she sneaks out and kills herself. Heroin. Cops found her behind the church. She was six months to the day from walking out of that mall with Big Whitey.”

They were all silent after that. Will looked at the three photographs. Branson hadn’t exaggerated. Sorensen was beautiful. He could imagine the girl would believe a modeling agency was interested. The autopsy photo was a sharp contrast, a dark reminder that the only person who would want her now was her grieving mother.

Finally, Amanda asked, “You talked to Sorensen when she returned to Macon?”

“Yes.” Branson looked down at her hands. “He never gave her a name. She was told from the start to call him Big Whitey. She didn’t know his real identity, couldn’t give us any actionable intelligence. She was blindfolded most of the time, and when she wasn't being sold, she was locked in a closet or a suitcase. The description she gave was spotty—dark hair, dark eyes. No distinguishing features.”

Faith asked, “Do you think she was lying?”

“Yes,” Branson admitted. “She was terrified of him. Couldn't sleep in her own bed. She stayed in the closet the whole time she was home, back to the wall, waiting for him to come get her.”

“She was abducted at the mall,” Faith said. “What about CCTV?”

“The cameras were out. We don't know if he had someone from security on the payroll or if he was just lucky.” Branson added, “He's always been lucky.”

Faith asked, “No one saw anything at the mall or in the parking lot? No customers or friends?”

“No. And there was nothing on her cell phone or email, so he obviously made her keep it on the down low.” Branson added, “That's what he's good at, not being seen.”

Amanda finally spoke, and Will realized she hadn't been silent out of respect. She was livid. “I'm curious, Ms. Branson, as to why you've got a sex-trafficking case in your town and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation doesn't know anything about it.”

Branson's cheeks darkened with a blush. “You're right. This is all on me. I was ashamed that I couldn't do anything to save her, and I was angry that I was told not to pursue Big Whitey.” She turned to Chief Gray. “I should've told you, Lonnie. I was hellbent on proving you wrong. Instead of running around behind your back, I should've gone to you for help.”

Gray wasn't kind. “You're goddamn right about that.”

“I'm sorry.”

“That's enough,” Gray said. “Tell them what you found in the house.”

“You mean the shooting gallery?” Faith sounded surprised. She'd obviously thought that part was over.

Will had a sinking feeling that he knew the answer, but he asked, “What was behind the panel?”

Branson turned back to the laptop computer. She tapped the screen awake, then advanced the next image.

The photo of a young boy appeared on screen. The picture was grainy, obviously taken with a cell phone. The boy's eyes were blackened slits. Like Marie Sorensen's, his face was emaciated.

His lips were dry. Sores caked his skin. It was his eyes that made Will finally turn away. He could not stand to see the hollow look in the boy's eyes.

Amanda broke the silence, asking, "Cause of death was dehydration? Malnourishment?"

Branson seemed surprised. "No, he's alive."

Will felt truly shocked for the first time since the meeting had started.

Branson said, "We have no idea who he is. He can talk, but he won't."

Faith looked as if she wanted to grab Branson across the table. "He hasn't said anything for a week?"

Branson didn't answer. She'd been keeping this all to herself for so long that she'd lost perspective. Talking it out had obviously revealed her catastrophic errors.

Faith said, "I haven't seen anything about him on the news."

"I entered it into the FBI databases, but I kept Macon out of it." Branson glanced at Chief Gray. The man's hands were gripped so tightly together he looked as if he was trying to break the bones. "If the local stations picked up on the story, then Whitey would know the boy was still alive. The only thing we know for sure about this guy is he murders anybody who gets in his way. He'd kill that boy just as sure as I'm sitting here."

Faith asked, "Which hospital is he in?"

"He's been under close medical supervision." Branson didn't offer any further explanation. She told her chief, "Chances are he was abducted in another state. Wherever he's from, the local police force got the notice. For what it's worth."

Will knew that everyone in the room had gotten the notice. There was no way to read them all. Nearly 800,000 children were reported missing each year, which translated into more than two thousand notices a day.

Branson said, "The boy doesn't have any identifying marks. We don't know what region he's from. We don't know when he was taken. We've been combing through all the stranger abduction reports, but—" Branson seemed to realize how thin her excuses sounded. Her voice was weak when she said, "He's the only living witness who can identify Big Whitey."

Faith demanded, "How do you know that if he's not talking?"

"Because of his reaction when I said Big Whitey's name."

Because he has ... distinguishing marks ... on his body that are the same as Marie Sorensen's."

"Wait a minute," Faith said. "Back up. Who else knows about this?"

"No more than I can count on my hand." Branson listed them. "Detective Adams stayed downstairs while I cleared everyone from the scene. Only two paramedics were allowed in the basement—girls I've known since high school. Both of them have been taking turns watching the boy around the clock. We couldn't take him to the hospital. He's being kept at an undisclosed location. Dr. Thomas is treating him. I've known Dean since I was a child. There's one other officer who guards him when I can't. Only the people I trust with my life know where that kid is."

Will looked at Lonnie Gray, easily judging from the man's expression that he'd learned about this cabal just a few moments before the rest of them. His face was bright red. His mustache looked like a piece of chalk over his mouth.

Gray demanded, "And who exactly is this other officer who's watching the boy now?"

"She's with the sheriff's department. She's a good friend." Branson wouldn't look at Gray. Her cheeks darkened again. Will guessed the deputy was more than a friend. "I trust her."

"More than you trust me, apparently."

"I'm sorry, sir. I knew if you found out, you'd have an obligation to report this to the state. Other people in the department would find out. We wouldn't be able to keep him safe. Big Whitey has too much reach. The boy would be dead in a matter of hours."

"That again." Gray addressed the speaker on the table, telling Amanda, "Denise theorizes that Big Whitey has a mole on my force."

Will thought about the file on the redneck's desk. They had Bill Black's police record. They had his military details. It wasn't so much of a stretch to think Whitey had a cop or two working for his side. If the pattern held, he had more than a few.

Faith analyzed the situation differently. She told Branson, "You think someone tipped off Big Whitey about the raid."

She shrugged, but said, "The raid team breaches the house and finds three dead guys. Sid Waller's locked in the basement with an abducted boy. It practically had a bow tied on it."

Gray turned on Branson, demanding, "Who do you think is the mole? Vickery and Franklin were nearly killed tonight. Adams was attacked. Eric Haigh was tortured before he was murdered." He added, "Why do you think that is, Denise? Why do you think they tortured him?" He answered his own question. "They're looking for the boy. If they had someone on the inside, they wouldn't have to torture cops for information."

Branson looked down at the table. The room went silent.

Will thought about Lena Adams in the ICU. She had told Will that he would eventually find out she was doing the right thing. She had said the words as if they would redeem all the ills that came before. Had she thought that saving the boy would make up for losing her baby? Or was it simply a matter of Lena's eternal conviction that everything she did was for the greater good?

Will asked, "Does Lena know where the boy is?"

"I sure as hell don't," Gray interrupted. Will tried again, asking, "Does she?"

Branson shook her head. "Lena has no idea. I let her believe the state was already involved, that we had to be quiet about what happened to keep him safe. I doubt she even told Jared."

Gray realized, "She lied to Internal Affairs. None of this was mentioned during any of her interviews." He sounded disgusted. "Jesus Christ, Denise. You forced her to lie on record."

Branson defended, "Lena was protecting the boy. She knew what Big Whitey would do if he found out there was a witness."

"And I assume you let her believe I was okay with this?" Gray waved away any response Branson might come up with. "For the love of God. I can't believe I trusted you."

Faith said, "Obviously someone figured out the boy was alive. Why else attack Lena in the middle of the night? Why else go after the rest of the team that was there during the raid?" She told Branson, "Thanks for wasting my fucking time and nearly getting my partner killed."

Amanda took over. "Where is this boy now?"

Gray turned to his former confidant, making a show of waiting for an answer.

Branson equivocated. She told Amanda, "I'd rather not say on an open line, but I'll take your people to him as soon as this is over."

Surprisingly, Amanda didn't argue. "Denise, tell your paramedics to get ready for transport. We'll keep it quiet, but we have to move that boy to Atlanta."

Branson's inner cop took over. "Logistics might take a while. We'll need to get an ambulance. My paramedics are working alternating shifts. Dr. Thomas will need to get him ready."

Amanda moved a split second ahead of Will. "Sara Linton's still down there, right?"

Faith looked at Will. She answered, "Right."

Amanda said, "Will, do whatever it takes to get Sara in that ambulance to Atlanta. If there really is a leak down there, we need to use our own people as much as we can."

His mouth went dry. He couldn't swallow again.

Amanda took his silence for agreement. "We still have an active manhunt for Tony Dell. Even if the boy won't talk, we might be able to flip Dell. Again. Will, what time does your shift start?"

Will had forgotten about Bill Black's hospital job. "Eight."

"Don't go in early. Maintain your cover. You're a con. Dell is on the move. There's a heavy police presence. It would make sense for you to start asking questions."

He said, "There's a nurse I've been working. Dell's stepsister. She knows I was sent up for assault. I think if I work it right, I can scare her into talking."

"Terrorize her if that's what it takes." Amanda seemed ready to get started. "Lonnie, I'll be in touch."

"Thank you," Gray said. "I appreciate your—"

"Sir." Nick was apologetic. "She already terminated the connection."

Chief Gray didn't bother with formalities. He turned on Branson like a raging lion. "You have some nerve, lady. Make me come here in the middle of the night like I'm some goddamn schoolboy being called to the principal's office. Make me look like a fool in front of one of the most respected peace officers in the state. And I gather you'll still refuse to tell me the boy's location?" He waited for her to answer. When it was clear she wouldn't, he mumbled, "You worthless piece of shit. It sickens me to think you ever wore the uniform."

Tears came into Branson's eyes as she tried, "Sir, with all due respect—"

"You don't know the meaning of the word." Gray snatched his hat off the table. "Human Resources will be in touch. Don't try to reach out to me or any of my officers. Don't try to plead your case. Don't even say my name. As far as I'm concerned, your involvement with me and my department is over." He stormed out of the room.

Branson's throat worked. She looked down, pressing her palms flat to the table like she needed a moment to collect herself.

Faith didn't give her the time. "You're gay?"

Will was surprised by the bluntness of the question. Branson seemed ashamed. She looked away, her head turned to the wall.

Faith said, "Jared Long got a call from you on his cell phone a few minutes before he was attacked."

Branson seemed to understand. She wiped the tears from her eyes. "You thought I was two-timing with him."

"Why else would you be calling Lena's husband in the middle of the night?"

"I was worried about her. Something wasn't right."

"Because of the raid?"

"No, before that. She was just—" Branson tried to find the right words. "We're friends. That's all we are. But something's been wrong with Lena for a while. She was happy, pumped about taking down Waller, and then when it all came together, she just got sad. She wouldn't talk to me about it. I thought maybe Jared could tell me what was going on."

Will guessed that Lena hadn't told Denise Branson about the baby.

Faith quickly moved on. "Where are you keeping the boy?"

Branson took a deep breath. She held it for a while. Will could see the turmoil in her face. Every second of her life for the last eight days had been devoted to keeping the boy safe. She'd risked alienating her friends, losing her job, pissing off her chief. No cop ever wanted to hand over a case, especially one that ripped at their heart.

"Okay," Branson finally said. "We're keeping him at my girlfriend's farm."

"The sheriff's deputy?"

"Yes. She works two counties over. We've been together about a year. Nobody knows about us."

"Good," Faith said. "How far away is the farm?"

"Not far, but it's gonna take some time to put this together. We don't make phone calls. As you clearly know, all calls can be traced, even blocked ones. I didn't want any of their numbers showing up on my line. We check in on a message board for gay first responders." Branson looked at her watch. "Dr. Thomas comes in at six before he goes to work. My ex is already there—one of the paramedics. Her girlfriend will come at six to relieve her. My deputy is spelling me. I was supposed to take the night shift, but then the shit hit the fan."

Faith checked her own watch. "So, everyone will be there in a little over two hours?"

"Unless they read the message boards at four in the morning." She asked Nick, "Can I use your laptop?"

Nick offered, "The computer in my office is more private." He scooped up the Big Whitey files, telling Faith, "I'll get started on these."

Branson followed him to the door, but she didn't leave. "I'm sorry for wasting y'all's time. I always try to be tough as I need to be, never tougher than I have to be."

Will nodded, but Faith wouldn't give an inch. She waited for Branson to leave, then blew out a puff of air.

Will said, "What do you think?"

"I think Tony Dell's closer to Big Whitey than we thought." He nodded, though they both knew that's not what he was asking about.

"Whoever this Big Whitey is, he's a freaking genius." Faith couldn't keep the admiration out of her voice. "He played them like a fiddle."

"The two men in the house." Will coughed a few times before he could continue. "I could see Tony slitting their throats, then going after the third guy with an ax. He's a killer. He likes using his hands. He takes out the three of them, puts the brace on the basement door so Sid Waller's trapped, then he walks away."

"He was feeding Lena intel. He knew when the raid was going to happen." Faith waited out another coughing fit. "You still think Tony's not Big Whitey?"

Will gagged down some water. "I don't know what to think anymore. He's more like the point at the edge of somebody else's sword." Will coughed again. "And I know he's got that weird thing with his sister. Stepsister. But I can't see him with little boys. He couldn't stand to be in the same room with his own nephew.”

“You never know what people get up to,” Faith said. “Do you think the stepsister knows anything?”

Will shrugged to save his voice. He’d have to find a way to get Cayla Martin to talk. There was no other option.

Faith stared at the grainy cell phone photo on the screen. “Poor little lamb. He can’t be more than seven.”

Will didn’t want to look at the screen, but once he did, he couldn’t take his eyes off the boy. It didn’t seem possible he was still alive. How had he survived living in that dank, dark hole? And what had been done to him while he was there?

“I’ll call Sara.” Faith took out her cell phone and dialed the number.

Will opened his mouth to tell her there was no point. Nothing came out. He couldn’t speak, but not because of his sore throat. It occurred to him that the boy was not talking because he had nothing to say.

His expression in the photo told the story. The boy would never be the same again. He would never sleep as deeply or play with the same abandon. Chasing a ball, flying a kite, helping his mother set the table—none of this would ever be done without constantly checking for danger. The boy did not want to go back to his parents. They wouldn’t recognize him. They would take one look and ask who was this damaged creature and what had he done with their real son. It was all captured in the grainy photo on the screen—the fear, the loneliness, the overwhelming shame.

Marie Sorensen had the same look. She had been stolen. She had been abused. She had been thrown away. Even when she got home, she never felt safe. She had made the only choice that was truly her own.

Will couldn’t blame her.

There wasn’t a box in the world that was big enough to contain those horrors. Everything she’d survived had made her want to die. Who could fault the boy for thinking the same thing?

“Sara’s not answering.” Faith ended the call. “Do you think she’s at the hospital?”

He didn’t answer.

Sara was finished with Will. That much was obvious. But somehow, for the brief time they were together, she had managed to change him. She had tamed his beasts. She had made him feel safe. She had made him feel whole. Sara hadn't completely shuttered the file room, but she had made it seem further away—like someone else's memory, someone else's life.

Will had to tell her this, had to explain why she was so desperately needed.

“I'll find her,” he told Faith.

If anyone could coax the boy into talking, it was Sara Linton.

13.

“Sara?”

Sara turned over in bed, trying to get away from the noise. She hadn’t fallen asleep last night so much as collapsed from exhaustion.

“Sara?” Nell said. “Sara?”

Sara woke slowly, rousing from a deep, dreamless sleep. She put her hand over her eyes. “What time is it?”

“Just after four-thirty.”

Sara dropped her hand. She looked up at Nell. They were in the hotel room. After what happened with Will last night, Sara didn’t have it in her to drive back to Atlanta. “Is Jared okay?”

Nell gave an odd smile. “Possum just called. He says they’re going to wake him up. I was about to leave for the hospital.”

Sara forced herself to sit up. She hurt in all the wrong places.

“I’ll go with you.”

“You need to get the door. There’s a man who wants to talk to you.”

Sara finally managed to put together the conversation. There was only one man in Macon right now who would want to talk to her. She wasn’t sure she wanted to talk to him. Still, she brushed her fingers through her hair as she went to the door.

And then her jaw dropped when she saw Will.

For just a moment, Sara found herself thinking that she was responsible for the damage to his face.

Then she realized that he’d been beaten.

“What happened?” She reached up to him, but there was nowhere Sara could touch Will that wasn’t injured. Even the blood vessels in his eyes were broken. “Did someone choke you?”

He swallowed. The pain made him cringe. His voice was hoarse. “Amanda sent me.”

Sara could hardly understand him. “Come in.”

Will didn’t move. She grabbed his arm, pulling him into the room.

"Nell, this is a friend of mine." Sara let herself believe she was holding back details because Will was undercover. "He lives in Atlanta."

"Nice to meet you." Nell dug her hand into her purse, but her eyes were on Sara's hand, which was still wrapped around Will's arm.

Sara let go.

Nell said, "It's good, Sara. I'm happy for you." She held up her keycard. "I'll be at the hospital."

She nodded at Will before she left. The door closed automatically, slamming hard against the metal jamb.

Sara knew it would be pointless to go after her. She asked Will, "What happened?"

He put his fingers to his larynx as if he could force up the volume. "We've got about an hour."

She stared, disbelieving. "What?"

"I know you don't want me here." He coughed, the effort from talking obviously too much. "Amanda asked me to—" He coughed again. And again. His face started turning red.

"Sit down." Sara was still angry, but she couldn't let him pass out in front of her. She found a tiny bottle of Tennessee whiskey in the minibar. "Drink half of this."

Will sat down, but he wouldn't take the bottle. He hated alcohol.

"You won't get drunk," Sara told him. He still wouldn't take it.

She stuck the bottle in his face. "Think of it as medicine. It'll numb your throat."

Will reluctantly took the whiskey. He opened the cap. Instead of drinking the alcohol, he sniffed it. He scowled at the smell. He looked at the label even though Sara knew he couldn't read the cursive script.

"Will, drink the goddamn whiskey."

Her tone was sharper than she intended, but it worked.

He managed to swallow a mouthful before he gagged.

"Christ!" He heaved a cough from deep inside his chest. His eyes watered. He shook his head like a dog.

Sara crossed her arms to stop herself from soothing him. She'd been too worn out last night to think beyond closing her eyes, but now it all came rushing back. Every ounce of concern she felt kept getting overwhelmed by anger.

Will coughed a few more times. He screwed the cap back on the bottle and threw it into the trashcan.

Sara asked, "Are we going to talk about what happened?"

He blinked to clear his eyes. "Amanda—"

"Sweetheart, if you say her name one more time, one of us is going to have to leave. And it won't be me."

His jaw set.

Sara wasn't going to give in. "I mean it, Will. You come in here with your face all banged up. That cut should be stitched. You've got blood in your ear. You probably need an MRI. And I'm just supposed to pretend none of this exists, the same way I pretend you didn't have a childhood and you don't have scars all over your body and—" She couldn't go on. The list was endless. "Talk to me, Will. I can handle the strong, but I can't take the silent anymore."

Predictably, he did the exact opposite. He crossed his ankle over his leg. She saw the bottom of his boot. The Cat's Paw logo was on the heel.

Sara had to close her eyes for a moment so she didn't lose control. She counted to ten, then twenty, before she could look at him again. "Will, your not talking to me about things is what got us into this mess in the first place."

He swallowed. The alcohol had worked. He didn't flinch this time. "I'm sorry."

Sara felt like a schoolmarm, but she couldn't stop herself from asking, "Sorry for what?"

He picked at the stitching on his boot. "When I chased you. When I—" He stopped. "What I did when I caught you."

Sara blushed at the memory.

He said, "I was out of control."

She couldn't let him take all the blame. "We were both out of control."

"I hurt you."

"I'm not Amish, Will. I've had rough sex before."

His startled look told her he thought it was something else.

"I didn't tell you to stop." Sara couldn't understand how he could be so wrong about something so obvious. "I was never afraid of you. I was furious. I wanted to hurt you. But I wasn't afraid."

His eyes glistened. She couldn't tell if it was from the whiskey anymore.

“Will, I was mad at you—I’m still mad—because you lied to me. Not just once, but repeatedly. Obviously, something happened to you last night, too. We took it out on each other. It’s what adults do sometimes. But you need to know that you can’t just fuck me silly and make everything better.”

He was still upset. His voice was filled with self-recrimination. “I never wanted to be that way with you.”

“Baby—” The word came out of her mouth so naturally. Sara could see the effect it had on him, and she understood that as bad as things were for her last night, they’d gotten so much worse for Will after he left.

Sara sat down on the edge of the bed. “Please, just talk to me.”

He didn’t look at her. He leaned forward, elbows on his knees. She could see his jaw clenching and unclenching. A dark red mark crisscrossed the side of his forehead. There was a waffle print to the pattern, as if someone had kicked him.

He said, “I came here for somebody else.”

“Who?”

Will gripped his hands together. He stared at the floor. When he finally spoke, his voice was so soft that she could barely hear him. “I feel like I’m disappearing.”

Of all the things he could’ve said, this was the least expected. Sara didn’t know how to respond.

Will obviously didn’t expect her to. His jaw worked again. She could tell every fiber of his being wanted to stop. Still, he said, “All my life, I’ve been invisible. At school. At the home. At work. I do my job. I go home. I get up the next morning and I do it all over again.” He gripped his hands tighter. Seconds passed before he managed to continue. “You changed that. You made me want to get up in the morning. You made me want to come home to you.” He finally met her gaze. “You’re the first person in my life who’s ever really seen me.”

Sara still couldn’t speak, but this time it was because she was too overwhelmed. The sound of his desolation broke her in two.

“I can’t go back to that.” His voice was gruff. “I can’t.”

Sara couldn’t let him. Her anger slipped away like sand through her fingers. She gently cradled her hand to his face. She knew this man. She knew his heart. Will hadn’t hurt her on purpose. He’d been stupid and stubborn, but not malicious. And Sara couldn't be the woman Lena Adams thought she was. She couldn't demand perfection. She couldn't set her standards so high that no one could meet them.

She had already lost the first love of her life. She couldn't lose the second one.

"Okay." She rested her hand on the nape of his neck. "We'll be okay."

His eyes scanned her face, looking for any sign of equivocation. "Do you mean that?"

She nodded.

He nodded, too, as if he still needed to convince himself. "I'm sorry I hurt you. I was wrong."

"Please, don't do it again." Sara closed the distance between them. She wrapped her arms around his shoulders. "I'm your girlfriend. This isn't just about keeping things from me. It's about trusting me. I may not understand, or agree, but you have to trust me enough to tell me the truth."

"You're right." He held her close to his chest. His fingers stroked through her hair. She felt his lips press against the top of her head. "I need you to promise me something."

She pulled back so that she could see him. "Okay."

"Promise me we're never going to break up again."

She started to laugh, but there was a sincerity to his tone that stopped her.

Will said, "Actually, I'll promise. I'll never leave you." He sounded more certain than she had ever heard him. "You can tell me to go, but I won't. I'll sleep in my car outside your house. I'll follow you to work. To the gym. If you go out to dinner, I'll be at the next table. If you go to a movie, I'll be in the row behind you."

Sara felt her brow furrow. "You're going to stalk me?"

He shrugged his shoulder, as if this was all a done deal. "I love you."

She finally laughed. "Well, that's a really shitty way to say it."

"I love you."

Her response came as naturally as taking a breath before jumping into the deep end of the water. "I love you, too."

He leaned in but didn't kiss her. Despite his forceful words, he waited for permission. Sara touched her lips to his as softly as she could. The kiss was chaste, but it was enough.

He said, "We're okay."

She nodded. "We're okay."

He held her hand in both of his. He kissed her fingers. Then he turned her wrist and looked at her watch. "We need to go."

"Where?"

He stood abruptly. "I'll tell you about it on the way. Lena found something."

Sara guessed, "A winning lottery ticket?"

"No." He helped her up from the bed. "She found a little boy."

Sara pulled her BMW into an open garage bay. There were two other cars inside the metal structure, which was several yards from a sprawling, single-story house. They were on a horse farm. She could see a few mares and a colt out by a red barn. The sun was just cracking the horizon. The horses silently chewed some grass as they watched the garage door close.

Sara recognized the black Suburban parked beside them as a G-ride, or a government-issued SUV. She assumed either Faith or Amanda was here. The sheriff's cruiser in the far bay probably belonged to the owner of the farm. Keeping horses was as costly as it was risky. Normally, amateur farmers had to seek out more steady employment. Sara had been thrown from a horse twice in her life. She imagined owning a horse farm was only marginally less dangerous than being a sheriff's deputy.

Will got out of the car. He opened the back door and retrieved her medical bag from the back seat. He didn't hand Sara the bag. He carried it for her.

"This way," Will said, heading toward a side door.

Sara followed him as he picked his way past various small machinery taking up the last bay in the four-bay garage. She took Will's hand to steady herself as she stepped over a tractor attachment that looked like a gigantic yard rake. He held on longer than necessary. She stroked his fingers with her thumb, wishing she could erase the past twenty-four hours and start all over again. Or maybe not. In so many strange ways, she felt closer to Will than ever before.

Faith opened the door before Will could. She avoided looking at Sara. "Find it okay?"

Sara said, "The GPS led us straight here."

“Good.” She reached into her purse and pulled out a handful of Jolly Ranchers candy. “The boy’s still asleep. We didn’t want to wake him until we had to. Denise and her girlfriend are in the house with one of the paramedics. The doctor read the message board, so he knows not to come.”

“Sounds good.” Will took the candy and shoved it into his pocket. “I’ve got around two hours before I’m due at the hospital.

What’s the plan?”

Sara felt her stomach lurch at the thought of him going back undercover, but she kept her thoughts to herself.

Faith said, “The other paramedic is on her way with the bus. I was about to head over to dispatch. I want to be sitting on the supervisor so no one panics when they go off-radio. We don’t know how far this thing reaches. I’ll stay there until I get the word that the boy’s in Atlanta.”

Will asked, “Who’s going to follow the ambulance? Sara’s not going without backup.”

“Denise will be behind them the whole way. She’ll have her piece and her shotgun. Amanda thinks a larger escort team would alert Big Whitey.”

Will held out his phone to Sara. “Use this to check in with Faith every half hour.”

Sara tried not to bristle at being ordered around. “I’ve got my hospital BlackBerry.”

“The 689 number?” She nodded, and he pocketed his phone. “I’m serious. These people don’t mind collateral damage. You need to call Faith every half hour until you’re safe at the hospital.”

Sara wasn’t sure this was necessary, but Will didn’t give her a chance to disagree. He headed toward the house. She saw him take one of the candies out of his pocket. Instead of peeling away the wrapper, he bit it off with his teeth.

Again, Sara followed Will. He was back in top form—back in charge. Even in that awful maintenance uniform, he seemed like his old self. She watched him walk, the easy, athletic gait, the muscular line of his broad shoulders. Her big, tough cop. If Sara was trim, at least she was the kind of trim who didn’t settle.

Faith walked beside Sara. She was silent as they trudged across the yard. The tension crackled between them like static electricity.

Sara said, "You are a fantastic liar."

Faith grinned. "I really am."

Sara couldn't stop herself from smiling back.

Faith asked, "Did Will fill you in?"

"He told me everything."

Faith raised an eyebrow.

"Everything that's happened in Macon," Sara amended. Will had started talking the minute they'd left the hotel room. She'd never heard him speak for such an extended period of time. He'd told her about Lena's emailed tip, the rednecks, the boy found in the basement and Denise Branson's part in protecting him. The only detail Sara could've done without was the fact that Will had been riding a motorcycle, but even her shocked gasp did not stop him from talking. She'd actually slowed the car at one point, relishing his sudden candor, wishing he would extend it to the rest of his life. His childhood. His family. His bad marriage.

There weren't enough miles in the road.

Faith said, "Remember when you told me a while ago that you had to be on Will's side?"

Sara remembered the conversation well. Faith had asked her for details about Will's background. Sara hadn't felt right about sharing what little she knew. "I get it. You need to be on his side, too."

Faith smiled, obviously relieved.

Sara asked, "Did the doctor give you any treatment information?"

"The first few days, he gave the boy fluids, a round of antibiotics, but that was it. He's mostly been dropping by to give him a sense of routine and make sure nothing new pops up."

"That probably helped more than anything else. Kids always need structure."

"He's still in survival mode. Denise thinks his food might've been drugged while they held him. He won't drink Coke, but he'll drink bottled water. He tears everything apart like he's looking for a pill. He'll eat a bite, then wait to see if it makes him sick or sleepy, then he'll eat another bite. They've tried feeding him stuff that isn't easily tampered with, like fruit roll-ups and deli meats. He still breaks it apart before he eats it."

Sara nodded because there was nothing to say. She felt overwhelmed by the knowledge of the terrible things that happened to children. Faith must've been feeling the same. She was quiet until they reached the house.

The door opened and a petite African American woman came out. She was dressed in jeans and a T-shirt, but she had a gun on her hip and looked capable of using it. Her toned arms indicated she was no stranger to farm work. She spoke in a surprisingly soft voice. "Are you the doctor?"

"Yes," Sara told her.

The woman rested her hand on the butt of her gun as she stepped aside, letting them enter the house.

The kitchen was warm and cheerful. Obviously, the owner wasn't into decorating, but she'd managed to create a welcoming space with lots of soft wood tones. Sara guessed Denise Branson was the woman sitting at the table. She had the look of someone who'd lost everything that mattered. She slumped at the table. A mug of tea was in front of her. Rather than drink it, she aimlessly stirred the tea bag around by the string.

Faith said, "Denise?"

Denise looked up, managing a strained smile. "Dr. Linton?"

"Sara." She offered her hand to the woman. "I hear you've been taking good care of my patient."

Denise gave a wary look, as if she wondered whether or not Sara was making a cruel joke.

Faith covered the awkward moment. She opened the kitchen door. "I'm going to head over to dispatch. Just call me when you're ready. Will, keep your phone on you at all times."

He nodded before she left. Sara didn't like the look that passed between them.

The deputy locked the deadbolt with a key that she put in her pocket. "I'm Lila, by the way. Jasmine's in the back with the boy. You're Will?"

"Yes," Will answered. He put Sara's medical bag on the counter and shook Lila's hand.

The deputy had to crane her neck to look up at him. "I already said this to your partner, but thank you for doing this. We've been going it alone for a while."

"You're not alone anymore," Will told her. And then his eyes lit up when he noticed the box of Pop-Tarts by the stove. "Do you mind?"

She retrieved the box for him. "Help yourself."

Will swallowed the candy in his mouth. He coughed several times, but that didn't stop him from ripping open the packet.

Lila told Sara, "The boy's still asleep. I haven't fed him yet. I was going to make crepes. He wouldn't eat the pancakes yesterday. I think they were too thick."

Sara asked, "Do you eat with him, or just serve him?"

Lila was at the open refrigerator. She seemed disappointed in herself. "Damn. If he sees us eating the food, he knows it's safe." She shook her head as she took out a carton of eggs and a jug of milk. "I just served him a tray the same as his captors probably did."

Sara tried to take away some of the guilt. "You guys have been here all along. It's easy for me to come in with a fresh eye."

Lila said, "He won't leave the room. I put a television in there for him. He keeps the sound off, reads the captions. Denise got him some books, but he won't touch them. They can read at that age, right?"

"Yes," Sara answered. "He's probably used to having to read aloud, though."

"He read to his mom," Denise said, more to herself.

Will had finished one packet of Pop-Tarts. He opened another. "Did you try video games?"

Lila's face fell again. "Video games." She asked Denise, "Why didn't we think of that?" She scraped a pat of butter into the frying pan. "I should've taken my brother's Xbox. He's too old to play it, anyway."

Denise said, "We should've left him to the experts all along."

"You kept him safe," Sara said. "That's all that matters."

Denise stared down at her tea again. Lila started cracking eggs into a bowl.

Sara wondered what would become of these women. Denise Branson was looking at disciplinary actions, possibly criminal charges, but her fate rested with Lonnie Gray. From what Sara knew about the man, he was fair, but he also believed in swift justice. She hoped that Lila was safe. Unless someone told the sheriff, the deputy's part in this enterprise would remain anonymous.

"He's awake." Sara guessed from the paramedic's uniform that the woman in the doorway was Jasmine. Like her friends, she was petite, but there was something about her that indicated she wasn't going to be messed with. Faith had the same bearing. Sara guessed that knowing you could take down a two-hundred-pound ex-marine like Paul Vickery with a steel baton engendered a certain amount of confidence.

Sara said, "I'd like to go ahead and see him now."

Lila moved the skillet off the burner. "We'll go with you."

"Maybe not all of you." Sara chose her words carefully. "You've been so good to him. You've taken care of him. Denise, you literally rescued him." She paused. "He might feel that you won't like him anymore if he tells you what happened."

Again, Lila was quick to find fault with her own actions.

"We've been reinforcing his silence by walking on eggshells."

Sara corrected, "You provided a safe environment for him to heal."

Lila turned back to her cooking. She didn't seem mollified.

Sara told Will, "You come, too."

They all seemed to recoil at the idea.

Sara said, "I know it seems counterintuitive, but sometimes victims feel safer with men around. They think that brute strength can protect them."

Lila acknowledged, "I've had rape victims ask for a male detective. Sometimes, not always."

Will seemed more hesitant than any of them. "Are you sure?"

Sara advised, "Just sit down when you get in the room. Let him get used to you first. Seven-year-olds are highly adaptable. They're also extremely inquisitive. He'll want to know details about what's going on, what's happening next."

"We didn't tell him anything," Lila said. "We just kept saying he was safe."

Jasmine offered, "That's what he needed, Lila. You heard the doctor. He needed to feel safe and we made him safe." She looked at Will. "I don't know about you, though. I'm sorry, but he's just a little boy, and the people who hurt him looked a hell of a lot like you."

Sara didn't want to force it, but she said, "I'd really like him in the room. I think it would help."

The tension seemed to ramp up. Lila was the first one to break the silence. "She's been right about the other stuff. I say we give it a shot. If the boy freaks out, then Will can always leave, right?"

Will readily agreed. "Right."

Denise and Jasmine exchanged a look. Sara could tell they were used to acting by consensus.

Lila said, "Dee, if something ain't working, then you stop doing it and try something else."

Denise said, "The boy's already broken."

Lila pointed at her with the spatula. "Maybe it's time we let the professionals help put him back together."

Denise cupped her hands around her mug. She looked at the dark tea. Finally, she said, "All right. But the minute he even starts to look upset, you have to promise to leave."

"I promise," Will said, though he still seemed to be the most reluctant person in the room.

Denise stood up from the table. "I'll be right outside the door so he knows I'm there."

"Thank you." Sara retrieved her medical bag from the counter.

Denise preceded them down the hallway. Sara could tell the woman wanted to stop this, to push both Will and Sara out of the house and do what she'd been doing from the moment she'd rescued the boy from that dark basement. They had been protecting the child for more than a week. They had tended him, fed him, looked over him like guardian angels. Letting a six-foot-three man waltz into the room seemed like the last thing the boy needed.

At first, it looked as if the boy agreed. His eyes went wide when he saw Will. He shot up in bed, his back pressed against the headboard.

Denise gently soothed, "It's okay, baby. These people are friends of ours. They're here to help you."

The boy pulled up the sheet around his chest. They had dressed him in Spider-Man pajamas and put matching linens on the bed. There were toys on every available surface—Matchbox cars, a giant Transformer, enough Legos to build a small town. Picture books were stacked on the dresser. Nothing looked as if it had been touched. Someone had obviously gone to the local children's store and asked the clerk exactly what to buy for a seven-year-old boy, but this particular seven-year-old wasn't interested.

"Good morning." Sara entered the room, keeping her tone as even as possible. She'd always made it a practice to never talk down to children. "I'm Dr. Linton. This is Agent Trent. He's a police officer, but he works for the state, which is why they call him an agent instead of a detective.” She indicated for Will to enter the room. “Dr. Thomas isn’t going to be here this morning. He told me to say hello to you. I’m going to look after you if that’s okay.”

The boy didn’t move, but he didn’t protest, either.

Sara did a quick visual exam. Dr. Thomas had done a good job. For all intents and purposes, the boy looked like any healthy seven-year-old. His color was good. His weight appeared to be on the low-normal side. There were no indications of dehydration or neglect. The wounds on his face were healing well. Except for his fearful, cowering demeanor, she would never have guessed that the boy had been abducted.

Sara motioned Will toward the chair in the corner. “Agent Trent’s been in a fight with some very bad men. That’s why his face is bruised. You can see the red marks on his neck. They’re going to heal in a few weeks. Have you ever been bruised before?”

The boy stared at Will. He gripped the sheets up around his neck.

Sara continued, “In about two days, Agent Trent’s bruises will look dark purple or maybe even black.” She opened her medical bag. “Around ten days from now, they’ll start to turn green, then they’ll turn brown, then after about two and a half weeks, they’ll just disappear.” She asked the boy, “You’ve been bruised before, right?”

He still didn’t answer, but he looked at Sara now instead of Will.

“I’m going to put my fingers on your wrist, okay?” The boy didn’t flinch when Sara took his pulse. By seven years, he’d probably been to a doctor’s office dozens of times. He was used to the routine of examination.

Sara asked, “Do you know what causes a bruise?”

The boy didn’t respond, but she could tell he was listening.

“It’s blood trapped underneath the skin. That’s kind of gross, isn’t it?”

He stared at Sara.

“Well, I think it’s gross, and I’m a doctor.”

The boy’s gaze went back to Will, but he was studying him now rather than staring.

Sara pulled out her stethoscope. It was an old one she kept as a spare. Her parents had bought it for her when she first entered medical school. Sara held the chestpiece to her mouth and warmed it with her breath. The boy didn't need to be told what to do. He leaned forward in the bed so Sara could listen to his lungs.

She pulled up the back of his shirt. There were burns on his skin. Sara pretended to ignore them.

"Deep breath," she said, then listened longer than necessary. Dr. Thomas had treated the burns, but left them uncovered to prevent infection. There would be scars—scars similar to the ones Sara had seen on Will.

"Wow," she finally said. "Your lungs are very strong." The boy leaned back so she could listen to his heart. He gripped the sheets at his waist now, but his head kept turning in a triangle pattern. He looked at Denise, who stood in the doorway, then back at Will, then up at Sara. He was constantly checking his surroundings. His fingers worked the hem of the sheets as if he wanted to be ready at any minute to hide under the covers.

Sara told the boy, "You know you're in the state of Georgia, right? That's right above Florida."

The boy didn't answer, though there was something in his expression that told Sara that she was telling him things he already knew.

Sara said, "In a few minutes, we're going to ride in an ambulance like you did before. Only this time, we're taking you to Atlanta." She paused. He was paying close attention now. "The trip will take about an hour and a half. When we get there, you'll be at a hospital. I'll be with you the entire time."

The boy looked at Denise.

She told him, "Jasmine and Vivica will drive you. I'll be in the car behind the ambulance. Lila will come up later to check on you." She smiled as if they both shared a secret. "I told you we're not going anywhere."

Sara guessed Vivica was the other paramedic. She told the boy, "We won't have the siren on because this isn't an emergency. You're not sick. You're probably just tired and very scared. And you're not talking, so I need to look inside your mouth and make sure nothing's stopping you. Okay?"

The boy's eyes snapped back to Sara. He knew she wouldn't find a medical explanation for his silence.

“Just give me one second.” Sara dug around in her bag the same way Nell did when she wanted to look busy. “I don’t have a tongue depressor,” she lied. She turned to Denise. “Do you have any Popsicles?”

Denise obviously didn’t understand. “Popsicles?”

“I can use the wooden stick for a tongue depressor. Maybe there’s some in the freezer?” She stared her meaning into Denise. “Could you go look?”

Denise obviously didn’t want to. Still, she told the boy, “I’ll be in the kitchen. Okay?”

The boy didn’t nod, but there was some sort of unspoken language between him and Denise. She understood that his permission to leave was granted.

Sara rummaged around in her bag again. She said, “I like Denise a lot. Don’t you, Agent Trent?”

Will had to clear his throat before he could answer. “Yes. They’re all very good people.”

She told the boy, “Agent Trent sounds funny because his throat is sore.”

The boy looked at Will again, probably taking in the bruises ringing his neck.

She said, “Agent Trent doesn’t like to brag, but he knows some good jokes. Don’t you?”

Will looked stunned, then slightly panicked.

She tried not to use the same tone as she had with the boy. “Why don’t you tell him a joke?”

Will seemed at a loss for words. He was always telling her silly jokes. She had no idea why he couldn’t think of any now.

Sara prompted. “How about SpongeBob? Didn’t he get into some trouble lately?”

Will took a candy out of his pocket. He fumbled with the wrapper. Sara was about to let him off the hook when he said, “Butterflies taste with their feet.”

The boy just stared at him. Sara did, too. She had no idea what he was talking about.

Will popped the candy into his mouth. “Butterflies don’t have mouths that can chew or bite, but they’ve got these straw things that they use to suck nectar. That’s how they eat.” He cleared his throat. “But how do they know what to eat? They land on leaves and things with their feet, and that’s how they taste whether or not it's good. Their taste buds are in their feet."

The boy's eyes narrowed. He was skeptical, but intrigued.

Will could obviously tell this, too. He pulled his chair a few inches closer to the bed. "Did you know that most turtles can breathe through their butts?"

The boy shot an excited look at Sara, probably because Will had said "butt."

"It's true." Will pulled his chair closer. "They've got these little air sacs in their butts. So they keep their heads down under water and just stick up their butts when they need to breathe."

The boy had stopped gripping the sheet around him. He stared at Will with open curiosity.

Will said, "Actually, I just heard there was some kind of battle going on in the forest." He cleared his throat again. She hoped he didn't get cut off by another coughing fit. He said, "Insects versus the animals. Did you hear about this?"

The boy still would not answer, but he was leaning slightly forward.

Sara said, "I think I read about it in the newspaper."

"I'm sure you did. It's been all over the news." Will asked the boy, "Did you see it on television?"

There was an almost imperceptible movement from the boy as he shook his head.

Will told him, "They finally decided to have it out. The animals and the insects. They scheduled a football game. The winner gets to be the king of the forest forever and a day. And I mean forever, plus an extra full day." Will leaned his elbows on his knees. He asked the boy, "Are you sure you didn't hear about this game? It was huge."

This time, the headshake was more apparent.

"It was an epic game," Will said. "I mean, unforgettable. For years, the insects and the animals will be telling their kids about it."

The boy leaned forward even more, waiting.

"The first two quarters, it was no contest. The animals were pounding the insects. I mean, obviously, they've got physical superiority." Will feigned throwing a football. "One after the other, touchdown, touchdown, touchdown. The animals dominated the field. The insects couldn't do anything to stop them. Then halftime comes." Will held up his hands as if to stop everything. “The insects were crying like babies in the locker room. They were going to lose this thing. They knew it. They could feel it in their exoskeletons. Humiliation for the rest of their lives. But they still go back out onto the field. They can’t just walk away, right? Not after all these years. They may be invertebrates, but they’re not quitters. Am I right?”

The boy nodded. He was hanging on Will’s every word.

“So, they start the third quarter, and suddenly, the caterpillar walks onto the field. He’s strutting his stuff. He takes up the wide receiver position—and I mean really wide. You can imagine the turning radius on this thing. So, the cricket snaps the ball, and suddenly, whoosh”—Will swooped his hands through the air —“the caterpillar takes off. He’s hogging the ball, running up and down the field like crazy. Touchdown after touchdown. I mean, the caterpillar is on fire. He doesn’t just win the game. He runs up the score. At the end, it’s animals 34, insects 212.”

The boy’s lips parted at the very thought.

“The insects are ecstatic,” Will continued. “They all run out onto the field. They lift the caterpillar up in the air. They’re carrying him around. They can’t believe it. They’re king of the forest forever and a day. And then somebody says to the caterpillar, ‘We could’ve won this thing before halftime, man. Where were you all that time?’ ” Will paused for effect. “And the caterpillar says, ‘Puttin’ on my shoes!’ ”

The boy sucked in a shocked breath, then exploded with laughter. His mouth opened. He doubled over. His tiny fists were clenched from the effort. He looked at Sara, as if to ask, Can you believe that? Sara didn’t have to pretend to laugh along with him. The boy’s unrestrained joy was the sweetest thing she’d heard in a long while.

He fell over onto his side. The sheets were a forgotten memory. For a brief moment, he was just a kid again.

Then, like a curtain being drawn, the laughter died out and the memories came crushing in. Slowly, the boy pushed himself back up against the headboard. He tucked the sheets tightly around his waist.

Will pulled a handful of Jolly Ranchers out of his pocket. “You want one?”

The boy chose a watermelon-flavored candy. With careful dexterity, he peeled away the wrapper. Sara held out her hand for the trash. The boy's lips puckered as he sucked on the candy. Something was different. She knew that his guard was still up, but there was daylight between the cracks now.

"You know," Will began, "the man who did this to my face will be in a lot of trouble when they catch him." He crossed his ankle over his knee, casual. "He'll end up in prison for the rest of his life. Maybe Denise or Lila will arrest him. Or maybe somebody else. There are a lot of cops out there who are good people. They make sure that the bad guys get locked up so they can't hurt anybody else."

The boy rolled the candy around in his mouth. Sara could hear it click against his teeth.

Will said, "People who do bad things always get caught. Did you know that?"

The boy seemed to consider the question. Finally, he shook his head.

"You don't know it or you don't think it's true?" Will asked. The boy shook his head again, then stopped. Instead of talking, he held up two fingers.

Will said, "You don't think that's true?" The boy nodded.

Will told him, "I know you're a smart little boy, but you're wrong about that. This is what I do for a job. I chase down bad people and I lock them up."

The boy looked down at the sheet. He picked at the stitching again.

"I arrested some really bad guys a few months ago. They told this little boy that his mommy and daddy would get hurt if he talked to the police."

The boy looked up, shocked.

"The bad guys were lying," Will said. "They were just trying to scare the little boy. His mommy and daddy were safe all the time. And when he told me what happened, I arrested the bad guys and brought the little boy home." Will leaned forward again. "Do you understand what I'm saying?"

The boy seemed to understand, but he didn't acknowledge it.

Will said, "The sooner you tell me what happened, the sooner I can get you back to your family. And trust me, they want you back so badly. You are all they can think about. No matter what the bad men did to you, they just want you back so they can take care of you and make sure you're safe."

The boy looked down at the sheet again. Tears slid down his cheeks.

Will said, "It's okay to talk to me, buddy. Whatever happened to you, it wasn't your fault. You're just a kid. And your mommy and daddy love you so much. They want you back home. That's all they care about. No matter what the bad men did to you, they will always, always love you."

The boy kept his head down. His mouth moved. He had to think about how to turn sounds into words again. "What about Benjamin?"

Will glanced up at Sara.

She asked, "Is that your brother?"

The boy nodded.

Will said, "I'm sure he wants you back, too. Even if you fought with him or didn't get along, none of that matters. Benjamin wants you back home with him."

The boy finally looked up at Will. "He's not home," he whispered. "He was in the basement, too."

Sara felt her heart stop. She was too paralyzed to speak. Another boy, a brother, still out there suffering horrible cruelties. Or, worse, not still out there, but lying somewhere in a shallow grave.

Will was obviously considering the same possibilities. He visibly struggled to keep his calm. "Benjamin was in the basement with you?"

The boy nodded his head. "The bad man took him away." Will's cool started to slip. His voice cracked. "Can you tell me your name?"

The boy didn't answer.

Will said, "I met a little boy last night, and he knew the name of his school. Do you know the name of yours?"

The boy still did not answer. He was getting scared again, worried that he'd said too much. He slid down the bed, pulled the sheets up over his head.

Will opened his mouth to say more, but nothing came out. He didn't want to give up, but he didn't know how to keep going, either.

Sara rested her hand on the boy's arm. He was shaking. They could hear his cries through the bedcovers. She told him, "It's okay, sweetheart. You don't have to say anything else for now."

You were very brave to tell Agent Trent what you did. And you're still safe. Nothing bad is going to happen to you."

Denise Branson cleared her throat. She was standing in the doorway.

Sara told the boy, "We're going to leave you alone for now, but we're all here if you need us." Sara stood up. She motioned for Will to follow her. "I'll be in the kitchen, okay? You don't have to talk anymore until you're ready."

Sara left the room, though she felt like part of her heart stayed with the boy. His brother had been taken, too. Why hadn't they found him at the house? Where had he been taken?

Sara told Will, "I'll try again in a few minutes."

Will pulled out his phone. The glass was shattered, but the phone seemed to be working. Sara assumed he was calling Faith, but then he said, "This is Agent William Trent. I need a national alert issued immediately on the authority of Deputy Director Amanda Wagner. Two missing brothers, both disappeared on the same day, possibly more than a week ago. No name on the first kid, but he's around seven years old, has dark hair and brown eyes. The second kid is called Benjamin."

Sara told him, "Or Ben. Or Benji."

Will's expression showed absolute shock. He almost dropped the phone. "What did you just say?"

She knew that he wasn't good with nicknames. "Benjamin is sometimes shortened to Ben or Benji."

"Benji?" Will braced his hand against the wall. He seemed stunned.

She asked, "What is it?"

"Give me your keys."

14.

Will pushed the needle on the BMW's speedometer past one hundred as he sped away from Lila's farm. She lived only a few miles from the interstate. He barely slowed for the turn. The tires skipped across the road, but the BMW stayed upright. Will cut off a lane of cars as he merged onto the interstate. He was going fast, but it didn't feel fast enough. He shot past the exit for Macon General. The engine screamed as he gunned it harder.

He was coming up on the exit that led to Cayla Martin's house when his phone finally rang. Will drove one-handed as he answered, "Did they get him?"

Faith said, "They can't find Cayla Martin's street."

Will cursed under his breath. "What about the cops who knocked on her door last night?"

"They're both off-duty. Neither is answering their phones. They're probably asleep."

"Send somebody to wake them up."

"Don't you think I did?"

Will tried to tamp down his frustration. "They have to find the house, Faith. Tell them to send out a helicopter."

"The state highway is thirty miles through that zip code, Will. We've called the road crews. We've called the park service and waste management and the post office and the middle school. We've got three cruisers out there already. They're trying."

"It's a dirt road. There's a trailer park and—"

"We'll find it."

"Tell them to look for me. I just passed Macon General. I'm taking exit twelve now."

The phone was muffled as Faith relayed the information. She came back on the line. "Cayla Martin was seen at the hospital half an hour ago. She was picking up her paycheck. Her car is still in the parking lot, but we can't find her."

"Did they check the employee entrance? She goes out there to smoke."

"Hold on." Again, Faith put her hand over the phone to talk to the dispatcher. "They're checking now."

"Did you find an Amber Alert on two missing brothers?"

"We've got nothing."

"That's impossible," Will argued. "Two brothers went missing on the same day. Why didn't we hear about it?"

"Maybe the police thought it was a parent abduction?" Faith pointed out the obvious: "Something like that wouldn't make it on the news cycle unless there were bodies." She asked Will, "Are you sure the boy wasn't making it up? Kids that age lie about everything. Maybe the other kid was a cousin or friend, or—"

"He wasn't lying," Will said. "And you don't believe in coincidences. Benjamin's not a common name around here."

"You're right," Faith admitted. "Amanda's talking to the Mounties." The Canadian federal police. "Their news doesn't trickle down much unless you're in a border state. She thought maybe the boys came from up there."

"What about the French-speaking parts?" Will asked. "The Mounties don't serve those areas."

"Did either of the boys sound French?"

"Maybe they're bilingual. I don't know, Faith. Just tell her to call everybody."

Faith said, "I'm sending her a text right now."

Will was silent, waiting for her to type it out. His head was spinning. He didn't know how this had happened. Benjamin had been right there in front of him. He'd practically begged Will to help him. He'd said he'd been taken a month ago. Will had thought the kid meant taken away from his mother by the police, not abducted by a sadist.

Big Whitey.

Will knew what had happened to Marie Sorensen. He'd seen the cigarette burns on the boy's back this morning. Denise Branson had rescued him from the basement. What happened to the boys who weren't rescued? What despicable things were being done to Benjamin right now?

"Okay," Faith said. "I sent Amanda the text. We got a no on Cayla in front of the employee entrance to the hospital. She's not on the roof or in the stairwells, either. How far are you from the house?"

Will slammed on the brakes. The car shook. He jerked the gear back into reverse. He'd almost missed the turnoff. "The road's at a steep angle from the main highway, roughly ten miles from the interstate." He silently berated himself for not resetting the odometer when he got off the interstate. "There are a lot of overhanging trees. There's a yard sign where the turn is." He recognized the logo. "It's for the trailer park. It's got palm trees on it."

"I'll let the cruiser know."

Will laid on the gas as he sped down the dirt road. Red dust curled up behind him. The screen on Sara's dashboard flashed black. There was no map in the GPS system for the dirt road. Will muttered another curse at his own stupidity. The screen had been in front of him the whole time.

He told Faith, "Track my phone. Maybe the roads will show up on the military GPS."

"I'm on it," Faith said. "Call me when you get there."

Will ended the call and tossed his phone onto the seat. Then he thought better of it and jammed the phone into his back pocket. As long as the trip to Cayla's had felt the night before, the trip this morning seemed unending. The road spread out ahead of him. It felt like half an hour passed before he saw the trailer park. Kids were out playing in the yard. Will slowed, looking at their faces, checking for Benjamin. They all stared back. Some of them headed home. They'd probably been taught to run if a strange man ever looked at them twice.

The steering wheel jerked as the BMW hit a large pothole. Will fought the turn, overcorrecting. He straightened the tires just in time for another loud bump as the wheels finally hit solid pavement. He was in the subdivision now. The empty lots and unfinished building sites were even more desolate in the light of day. Fortunately, Will could easily see the cluster of completed houses. He skidded to a stop in front of Cayla's driveway. There was no car there. He jumped out of the BMW. He checked the windows to the garage. Empty.

Will dialed Faith's number as he ran up the front walk. He said, "I'm here. There's no car. The house looks empty."

"The cops from last night are on their way. They've got two more cruisers with them. I know you don't have your gun. Wait for backup."

"I'm not waiting." Will ended the call. He stepped back from the front door, then kicked it open. "Benjamin?" he called. His voice echoed through the house. "Benjamin?"

Will opened the coat closet. He checked the back wall to make sure there wasn't a hidden panel. Next, he went into the garage. The space was unfinished, just the structural studs. There were no hiding places.

The kitchen looked the same as the night before. Will's cleaned plate was still on the table. The pots and pans were still on the stove. Tony Dell's beer cans were stacked on the counter.

"Benjamin?" Will called. He took the stairs two at a time. He stopped outside the bathroom, but didn't go in. There was a surface bolt on one of the bedroom doors. A heavy-duty combination lock held it closed.

"Benjamin?" Will banged on the door. "It's Mr. Black from last night. I'm a police officer. I'm here to help you." The lock was secured with bolts, not screws. There was no way for Will to pry it loose. "Benjamin, I need you to stand back. I'm going to break open the door."

Will waited a few seconds, then raised his foot and kicked the door. The lock rattled against the wood. He kicked again. The wood around the jamb started to splinter. He raised his foot and kicked it again. Then again. Finally, by sheer repetition, he was able to break apart the wood. The door popped back on its hinges. The knob stuck in the sheetrock.

Benjamin was chained to the floor. He was sitting in the corner, his back to the wall. He was obviously terrified.

"It's okay," Will told him. "I'm a police officer. I'm here to help you."

Benjamin didn't respond. Will quickly took in the situation. A pair of handcuffs linked the boy's ankle to the chain. The end was attached to an eyehook screwed into the floor. Someone had doused it with Liquid Nails to keep the boy from backing out the screw. Probably Tony. It seemed like the kind of half-ass job he'd do. Tony should've thought about the fact that Benjamin wouldn't have anywhere to use the toilet. The wood had softened from urine. Will easily wrenched the hook out of the floor.

Then he heard a car door slam shut.

Will ran to the front window. Paul Vickery got out of a white Honda. He had a gun in his hand.

"Shit," Will muttered. He should've known Vickery was involved in this.

Will took out his iPhone. He asked Benjamin, "Do you know how to send a text message?"

Benjamin nodded, his eyes still wide with terror.

"You're going to send a text to my partner." Will swiped the screen. He selected the right app, then dialed Faith's number before handing the phone to Benjamin. "Type in your name. Tell her that you're hiding in Cayla's house. Tell her to hurry." Will scooped up Benjamin in his arms as he left the room. There was an attic hatch in the hall. Will had seen it when he stood at the top of the stairs. He held Benjamin up. The boy didn't have to be told what to do. He pushed open the hatch and climbed into the attic.

Will told him, "Don't make any noise. If they find you, don't go anywhere without that phone. Do you understand? It's got a tracker in it. We can find you if you keep the phone. Put it in your pocket. Don't lose it."

Benjamin pulled up the chain around his ankle. The hatch fell into place just as the front door slammed open.

Will barreled down the stairs at a full run. Paul Vickery had attacked him two times before, but each time, the man had surprise on his side. This time, Will had the upper hand. He also knew that crooked as Vickery was, he was a trained police officer. He'd do exactly what Will had done. Check the closet. Check the garage. Check the kitchen.

Vickery was coming out of the kitchen when Will launched himself off the stairs. Vickery's mouth opened. He didn't have time to scream. Will tackled him to the floor like a pile driver. Vickery's gun skittered out of his hand. Will slammed his fist straight into the man's face. As awful as the situation was, Will couldn't help but feel the sweet victory of payback as Vickery's nose exploded like a blown tire.

Will reared back for another go, but Vickery didn't move. Like most bullies, he had a glass jaw. One hit and he was unconscious. Will sat back on his heels feeling supremely disappointed.

"Damn, Bud," Cayla Martin said. She was standing at the busted-open front door. She had a Taser gun pointed at Will's chest.

The M26-C carried a compressed-nitrogen air cartridge that shot two tiny barbed probes up to fifteen feet away. The probes were attached to insulated conducting wires. The wires were attached to eight double-A batteries that delivered up to fifty thousand volts of electricity. Enough juice to cause complete neuromuscular incapacitation.

Will lunged for Vickery's gun, but he wasn't fast enough to outrun the nitrogen charge. The probes dug into the back of his neck.

He was unconscious before he hit the floor.

15.

FIVE DAYS BEFORE THE RAID

Lena laid back on the table at Dr. Benedict's office. Her head was elevated, but her legs dangled uncomfortably over the end. She tried to keep the paper gown from riding up. It was no use. She was quickly learning that you had to choose between being pregnant and being modest. This was the first of many compromises Lena saw in her future. She already had the sensation of her body being taken over. She was peeing more. Sleeping more. Hell, she was even breathing more. The weird part was that instead of feeling invaded, Lena felt happier than she'd ever been in her life.

"You decent?" Jared peered around the door. He saw Lena and gave a low whistle as he walked over to the table. "Babe, I'm seeing some bedroom opportunities here."

She rolled her eyes, even though she felt a strange thrill when he talked like this. And he was talking like this a lot lately.

She asked, "What'd you say to get out of work?"

"Told them I needed some personal time. They think I'm having an affair."

She slapped his arm. "That's not funny."

He laughed good-naturedly as he looked around the room. "What is all this crap?"

"Got me," Lena said, though she recognized the ultrasound machine. Just looking at it made her nervous. She didn't know what she would do if something was wrong. No heartbeat. The baby's brain growing outside of its head. Horror stories were all over the Internet. She'd turned off the computer last night and thrown up in the hall bathroom.

Jared pulled out one of the stirrups. "You think they sell these tables at Costco?"

“Can you not be disgusting?” She slid the stirrup back in with her heel. “It’s bad enough I’m gonna be poked and prodded for the next eight months.”

“Seven and a half.” He picked up the plastic model of a uterus. The pieces fell apart in his hands. “Shit, the baby went under the table.”

Lena watched him get down on his hands and knees to retrieve the plastic fetus. His ass was in the air. His uniform pants stretched in a not unpleasant way. They worked out at the gym together almost every morning. Sometimes, Lena watched him doing squats while she ran on the treadmill.

“Found it.” Jared stood up, holding the fetus like a toothpick between his thumb and forefinger. “You okay? Your face is red.”

Lena put her hand to her cheek. She changed the subject. “I saw this pregnant woman at the store yesterday. The checkout lady patted her stomach like she was a dog. Then she said, ‘Good job, Mom,’ like it takes a special skill to get knocked up.”

Jared grinned. “You think people are gonna pat my crotch and tell me good job?”

“Not unless they want my Glock up their ass.”

He laughed, putting the plastic baby in the uterus, snapping the pieces back together. “You know my mom’s gonna wanna be here when it happens.”

Lena didn’t want to talk about that. Today was supposed to be happy.

“I’m just warning you,” Jared said. “And telling you that I want her here.”

“Do I have a choice?”

“Your skeevy uncle will probably come, too.”

“At least Hank will have the decency to stay in a motel and leave the next day.”

Jared couldn’t argue with that. Hank had visited a few times since they got married. He was very mindful of outstaying his welcome.

She said, “It’s bad luck to talk about any of this now.” Lena couldn’t help adding, “Like painting the nursery. And looking at cribs. We need to wait another couple of weeks.”

He put the uterus back on the counter with a thud.

She tried, “Besides, if you’re going to work around the house, you should finish the kitchen.”

"It'll be finished before the baby comes."

"It'd better be." Lena felt a fight brewing. She pulled back, not wanting the day ruined. All week, Jared had been talking about seeing the baby for the first time. She couldn't mess this up for him.

Lena asked, "You're never late. What kept you?"

"They put in the marker for Lonnie's son this morning. Some of us rode by to pay our respects."

"That's nice." Lena felt a swell of sympathy for the chief. His son had died after a long illness. Lonnie wouldn't let him go, even when it was clear that nothing could be done to save him. In the end, they'd hooked him up to every machine in the ICU.

Jared said, "Something bad like that happens to me, promise me you'll pull the plug."

"I'll pull it right now."

"I mean it," he said. "Don't let me hang around like that. Peeing in a bag. People touching me like I'm a baby." He asked Lena, "What's the point of touching somebody who's in a coma? What if they don't want you to? They can't stop you. They're just trapped there. That's some creepy shit." He shuddered. "And don't let my mama dress me up in pajamas. You know she'd get crazy like that."

Lena felt her lip start to tremble.

He stared at her, confused. "Are you crying?"

"Yes, I'm crying, you dipshit." She wiped her eyes with the back of her hand. "Why would you talk about dying in the hospital when I'm carrying your fucking baby?"

"Jesus," he muttered. He pulled a tissue out of the box on the counter. There was only one left. He handed it to Lena. "Don't be crying like that when the doctor comes in. He's gonna think I hit you or something."

Lena blew her nose. "Talk about something else."

He easily found a different subject. "How's the raid going?"

Jared had tipped her off about a shooting gallery on Redding Street. He was following the case like a gambler who'd placed a large bet.

She told him, "It's going to shit, is how it's going." She used the dirty tissue to wipe her eyes. "I need more Kleenex."

He opened the door and called, "Nurse? Can we get some more Kleenex?" He waited in the open doorway, asking Lena, "You get anybody to flip on Sid?”

“What do you think?” She wiped her nose again. “Denise is about to have a stroke. She’s convinced this is our way into Big Whitey.”

Jared rolled his eyes. He liked Denise, but girls like Marie Sorensen ran off all the time. Using Big Whitey as the bogeyman took some of the blame off her shoulders.

Lena felt the need to take up for her friend. “He could exist. Denise found his name on a wire out of Florida.”

Jared shook his head with the sort of disregard that made her want to smack him. “I’m with Lonnie on this one. It’s a dead end.”

“Sid Waller is the key,” Lena insisted, though she had come to accept lately that Waller was still going to be walking around free when her kid graduated from high school. “Once he’s locked up, he’ll start singing.”

“Mean ol’ Big Whitey will kill Waller before he lets that happen. Right?”

Lena narrowed her eyes at Jared. He was giving her shit again.

He said, “Trust me, as soon as Sid Waller’s dead, Chief Gray is gonna get out of the Big Whitey business. It’s just too dangerous for him right now. And we both know he lost his edge when his son died.”

“Right,” Lena said, her tone matching his. “Lonnie Gray is going to back down for the first time in his life.”

The nurse handed Jared a fresh box of tissues. He told her, “Thank you,” then pivoted back to Lena. “Maybe Lonnie is really Big Whitey. Did you ever think about that?” The door clicked shut. He grinned at Lena. “How crazy would that be? Chief Gray is secretly a dope-swingin’ kiddie pimp.”

“Stop talking out of your ass.” Lena grabbed some tissues and blew her nose as loudly as she could. She hated that his stupid idea actually made a weird kind of sense. Gray had started out in Florida. Over the years, he’d either worked or consulted in several towns up and down the coast, including Savannah. All the mayhem they were seeing in Macon had coincided with Gray coming on board. If Denise was right and there was a mole in the department, then it had to be a mole who knew everything. What better cover was there than being the chief of police?

And what bigger idiot was there than a woman who believed every harebrain theory that came out of her husband's mouth? Less than five minutes ago, Jared was saying Big Whitey didn't even exist. Last week he claimed he'd heard from a guy that Fort Knox had been robbed of all the country's gold. Why on earth was she listening to him now?

Lena shook her head, hoping to God she was suffering from pregnancy hormones and not losing her mind.

He asked, "Why are you shaking your head?"

She didn't answer, knowing there was no point. "I'm stressed about the raid crapping out. Denise and I are both putting our asses on the line over this, and you know Lonnie doesn't forgive or forget."

Jared moderated his tone. "Lookit, something will come up." He waited for her to blow her nose again. "Something always comes up. You're a good cop, babe. You're smart and driven and you never give up. You'll make it happen."

Lena couldn't help it. There was something about the way he looked at her that made her want to cry again. She slipped her hand into his. Jared's arm tensed, but he didn't pull away. He wasn't used to affection. His mother was a cold fish. Lena had never once seen Nell touch any of them. Of course, Lena wasn't the clingy type, either. She couldn't explain why touching Jared was the only thing that soothed her nerves lately. This wasn't the kind of thing she could ask Dr. Benedict about. She'd tried to look it up on the Internet, but most of the pregnant women online seemed to hate their husbands. And there were only a limited number of phrases you could Google on pregnancy before you were inundated with some seriously disgusting porn.

Jared asked, "You okay?"

She chewed her lip, silently willing herself not to start crying again.

He turned sheepish. "You know I love you, right?"

"Yeah," she managed. "Tell me that when I look like I should be swimming in a tank at SeaWorld."

"Babe, as long as you keep getting big in other places, I'm fine."

Lena rolled her eyes. Then she jerked her hand away when the door opened.

Dr. Benedict walked over to the sink to wash his hands. He told Lena, "I'm sorry I kept you waiting."

Jared winked at Lena. This was the first thing the man said every time he entered the room. They joked that his wife probably heard the same thing when they were in bed.

“Lie back for me.” Benedict pulled out the extension on the table.

Lena laid her head on the pillow and straightened her legs. She looked up at Jared. He put his hand on her forehead. The move was clumsy—more like he was checking her for a fever—but she didn’t complain.

Benedict turned on the ultrasound machine. Unceremoniously, he lifted the paper gown. Lena saw what she’d been denying all week. Her underwear was tight. Pretty soon, it would be rolling under her stomach like a rubber band. She looked up at Jared, expecting a joke. He wasn’t laughing. He was watching the monitor, even though nothing was on the screen yet.

Benedict shook the bottle of gel over Lena’s stomach. “A little cold,” he said, sounding just as practiced as usual. He squeezed the bottle. Nothing came out. He told Lena, “Just a moment,” then rolled his chair over to the door. He called into the hallway, “Could you bring me some more gel?”

He rolled his chair back to the table. His cold hands touched Lena’s stomach as he felt around for things he didn’t bother to articulate. She wondered again if she should’ve gone to a female doctor. Then again, her regular doctor was a woman and she had the bedside manner of a dingo.

The door opened again. Lena was glad her feet weren’t up in the stirrups. The hall was filled with people.

“Here you go.” The nurse was the same one who’d brought the tissues. She handed the doctor a new bottle of gel. “I got this off the warmer?”

Lena didn’t know which was more annoying—the way the woman raised her voice at the end of the sentence or the fact that no one had warmed the first bottle.

Benedict didn’t seem to notice the difference. He shook the bottle and repeated, “A little cold.”

Lena looked up at Jared as the warm fluid hit her skin. He winked at her again. She felt the ultrasound probe press against her belly. The fat rolled around in a way she wasn’t ready to acknowledge. Instead, Lena watched the monitor, the shifting white and black folds.

This was really the stupidest thing she'd ever done. Lena understood why the doctor had to see the image, but there was no reason for Jared to watch her insides get pushed around. There was a pregnant secretary at the station who framed every ultrasound photo she got. Lena couldn't walk through the office without tracking the progress of the weird little alien blob. It seemed like nothing was private anymore.

Benedict's eyebrows were furrowed. He stared at the screen as he pressed the probe harder.

Lena asked the words she'd been dreading. "Is something wrong?"

Benedict didn't answer, which made it ten times worse.

The nurse said, "Listen." She turned one of the dials on the machine. A slow wah-wah sound came out of the speakers, like something you'd hear in a submarine movie.

Lena thought she'd missed whatever she was supposed to listen for, then the rapid thump-thump-thump of a heartbeat filled the room.

Jared gasped. "Is that the—" He looked down at Lena. "It's the heartbeat." He pressed his hand to her chest, felt for her heart.

"It's different."

He was right. Lena's heart was beating its usual slow rhythm, while the baby's heart sounded like the wings of a hummingbird fluttering against a windowpane.

The nurse said, "See your baby?"

Lena looked at the monitor. Nestled inside the folds was a little black dot. Dr. Benedict moved his hand around, and the dot turned into a bean. Lena could see the heart flashing.

"Holy shit," Jared whispered. "Holy shit."

Lena heard herself thinking the same words in her head. How had they done this? How had they created something so perfect? She couldn't take her eyes off the little bean. The round edges, the curve in the center that was going to be a stomach. Soon, the bean would sprout real arms and legs, and a head with sweet little eyes and a crescent-shaped mouth.

But for now, he was just a tiny, fluttering little bean.

Her bean.

Lena had never seen anything so beautiful in her life.

Dr. Benedict said, "Everything looks good. You're six weeks along. Come back next week around this same time." He tapped some buttons on the ultrasound machine. A printer whirled to life. Benedict stood up. He went to the sink to wash his hands. "I'll make sure you get a disc with the ultrasound. The picture should be ready in a few minutes."

Jared leaned down, looking Lena in the eyes. "This is it, babe. You and me and the beginning of everything."

Lena's brain told her the words were melodramatic, but her heart—her heart took in the tears in his eyes, the silly grin on his face, the touch of his hand as his fingers laced through hers, and started to crumble.

He told her, "Nothing's ever gonna be the same again. One day, we're gonna both be sitting in our diapers at the old folks' home and talking about how this is the moment that changed everything."

Lena put her hand to his cheek. Her thumb traced his lips before she gently pushed him away. She wasn't going to start crying again in front of strangers.

Jared understood. He winked at her, joking with Benedict, "Thanks, Doc. Good job."

"You're welcome." Benedict obviously wasn't fond of getting off routine. He studied the nurse as he dried his hands. "You're filling in for Margery, right?"

"Yes, Doctor." The woman smiled warmly as she started wiping the gel off Lena's belly. "I've worked in your office before? I'm Cayla Martin?"

16.

FRIDAY

Will's brain burned in his skull. His muscles were still vibrating from the Taser. At least his body wasn't tensed up like a fist anymore. His hands and feet were no longer clenched into balls. His knees and elbows could straighten. Despite all that progress, sitting up felt like an impossible task. He lay with his back on the floor. Overhead, he heard Cayla Martin walking back and forth across one of the bedrooms. At least he assumed it was Cayla. Paul Vickery was bound and gagged beside him. Whoever was upstairs was walking in high heels.

Detective work.

The throbbing pain in his head had to be from something more than the Taser. Will had been Tasered before. Amanda had said it was an accident, but the way she cackled made him think otherwise. Will tentatively moved his head. There was a tender spot at the back. He blinked, wondering how many times his vision had gone wonky over the last twenty-four hours. He couldn't dwell on that. Actually, he couldn't dwell on anything because his mind yet again could not hold on to one thought.

Benjamin.

That was the one word that would not slip away. Benjamin was in the attic. He still had the chain around his ankle. Will had told the boy to text Faith. Where the hell was she? She'd told Will the cruisers were on the way.

Will had to get out of here. He had to find the police before Cayla disappeared. Paul Vickery was out cold, and not just because Will had hit him. There was a deep gash on the side of the man's scalp. He needed medical attention. Obviously, despite Will's assumptions, Vickery wasn't working with the bad guys after all. Whether this was a recent development or not was less clear.

Will tried to sit up. The muscles would not respond. He could only flop over onto his side. That was when he saw his wrists. They were tied together with twine. The knots were tight. The twine cut into his skin. Will tried to move his legs. His ankles were tied together, too. At least now he knew why he couldn't feel his toes.

Will struggled to sit up. His feet slipped. His hands couldn't find purchase. Finally, he angled himself up to sitting. He only had to close his eyes a few seconds before the nausea passed. Then he opened his eyes and felt sick all over again.

There was a man sitting on the couch. He had a Glock pointed at Will's head.

Will had never met Detective DeShawn Franklin in person, but he recognized the man from the photograph on Faith's cell phone. He was built like a linebacker, with broad shoulders and legs the size of fallen trees. He took up two cushion spaces on Cayla's sofa. The gun in his hand looked like a toy, though Will knew the police-issued Glock was a man-stopper.

Will checked on Paul Vickery again. He was still tied up. Hogtied, really. Which didn't explain why DeShawn Franklin was pointing his gun at Will.

Franklin lowered the Glock, resting the weapon on his knee. "Paul was coming here to save you."

Will didn't give him the satisfaction of hearing the string of curses that came into his mouth. He asked, "My partner sent him?"

"Your partner sent anybody who was listening on the scanner." DeShawn smiled. "Thanks for taking Paul out before I got here. Beat-downs aside, he's not a dirty cop. Woulda been hard explaining to him why I had to tie y'all up."

Will didn't acknowledge the comment. He had to assume the GPS tracker on his phone wasn't working. Faith knew he was at Cayla's house. She would send the cruisers. It was only a matter of time before twenty cops busted down the door.

Franklin seemed to read Will's mind. He took away his options one by one. "I told the cops me and Paul would secure the house. Last we saw, you were headed toward the woods on foot. They're setting up a perimeter on the other side of the highway." He told Will, "The whole damn force is out there looking for you, son."

Will rubbed his face with his hands. His fingers felt cold, probably because the twine around his wrists was cutting off the circulation. "You're working with Cayla?"

"I'm doing a favor for an old friend."

Will got the feeling he wasn't happy about it. "Where's the boy?"

"You tell me. He's not in the house. He's not in your BMW." He smiled again, showing his teeth. "That's a nice ride. State must pay a hell of a lot more than Macon PD."

Will asked, "You're Big Whitey?"

He laughed, genuinely amused. "I'm Big Blackie, motherfucker. You colorblind?"

Will didn't know what he was supposed to say. "Who's Big Whitey?"

Franklin didn't answer immediately. He looked down at the Glock, twisting it back and forth against his knee. "I was friends with his son. Chuck and me grew up together. We both graduated from the academy at the same time. Both moved around together. He got his lieutenant bars before me, but that's how it goes sometimes."

Will shook his head, trying to break a memory loose. "Eight, maybe nine months ago, we were out running. Chuck's leg snaps like a twig. No reason, just snaps."

Will had heard about this kind of thing before. He guessed, "Leukemia?"

"Now you're putting it together."

"Not really," Will admitted.

"Chuck was supposed to take over the family business. With him gone, who knows?"

"Chuck," Will echoed. The name was so familiar.

"I thought you state boys were smarter than this."

Will said, "I've had a bad couple of days."

"I hear you, brother. Doesn't look like it's gonna get much better."

Will heard something heavy drop on the floor upstairs. It was similar to the sound of a clue dropping into his lap. He told Franklin, "Cayla Martin told me she drove up the Tamiami Trail with a guy named Chuck."

Franklin smiled. "Maybe you're not so stupid after all."

Will realized there was a wall behind him. He slid over so he could lean back against it. The rest did him good. He said, "Chief Gray's son died recently." Will remembered something Faith had told him yesterday morning. "You were handpicked by Gray to follow him to Macon when he took over the force."

Franklin waited.

Will made a calculated guess. "Chief Gray is Big Whitey."

Franklin didn't acknowledge the revelation, but he told Will, "Lonnie was working in Jacksonville, but he lived in Folkston. Me, my baby sister, and my mama were up by the Funnel. Not many black kids around there, but Lonnie didn't bat an eye when he found me sitting at his dinner table."

"You should be glad he didn't kidnap and rape you."

The gun went up. Franklin pointed the muzzle at Will's head again.

Will said, "You didn't know Lonnie was into kids, did you?"

Franklin glared at him for a beat. Finally, he lowered the gun back to his knee. "He raised me more than my own daddy ever did." Disgust showed on his face. "Never heard Lonnie say anything about kids. Never saw him looking at them, talking to them, nothing. I guess as good as Lonnie was at fooling strangers about one thing, he was really good at fooling his friends about the other."

Will asked, "How'd it feel when you found out?"

Franklin let his silence answer the question.

Will said, "Being a badass drug dealer and a murderer is one thing. Raping kids is a whole other category." He could tell Franklin agreed with him. "It crosses the line, doesn't it? You put a cap in a junkie's ass, that's pretty much what he signed up for, but children are innocent. They didn't sign up for anything."

"I told you I didn't know."

"Denise Branson knew."

"You think anybody listens to that stupid dyke?"

Will didn't point out that the stupid dyke had been right all along.

"Lonnie was a God to me. To all of us. I had no idea he was ..." Franklin couldn't even say the words. "I'm glad Chuck didn't live to find out. It would've killed him all over again."

"How did you find out?"

"The house," Franklin said. He meant the shooting gallery. "I sent my guy in before the raid to take out Waller and his crew."

Will guessed Franklin's guy was Tony Dell. There wasn't another player in this thing who was so adept at killing.

Will asked, "What did your guy find?"

"What we expected. Three of them were in the front room watching TV. No problem, my guy takes them out quiet. He goes down into the basement looking for Waller and finds these two little kids instead." Franklin shook his head, and Will could see his turmoil was real. "One of the boys was already dead. Just laid there, my guy said."

Will thought of the boy back at Lila's farm. Playing dead had saved him from countless more miseries.

Franklin continued, "The second kid was barely breathing. My guy brought him here for Cayla to look after."

Will wondered if he knew how Cayla had looked after him. "The kid identified Big Whitey?" Franklin nodded, and Will tried not to think about Benjamin feeling safe because Franklin had a badge. "Your guy said Waller wasn't in the basement?"

"Right. Only, he's leaving out the back with the kid when he hears Waller bust in through the front." Franklin shrugged. "Waller runs down into the basement to check on his stash. My guy braces the door, traps him down there, and walks away."

"Why did you want to take out Waller's team before the raid?"

Franklin was obviously reluctant, but he answered, "I was worried about Lena getting hurt."

Will must've looked as dubious as he felt.

"I'm not an animal, man. I got two nieces. I helped raise up my sister after my daddy died." Franklin said, "I knew Lee was pregnant. Cayla fills in at a lot of the doctors' offices. She heard Jared telling Lena that he thought Lonnie was Big Whitey."

Will replayed the words in his head, making sure he understood them. "Was Cayla eavesdropping?"

"Nope. Jared was standing in the open doorway. Half of the office heard him call out Lonnie."

"And Cayla thought he was being serious, just tossing off that theory at the doctor's office in front of everybody?"

"That's what Cayla said."

"What did you think?"

"That he was bullshitting." Franklin shrugged. "Jared's a talker. All those bike boys are. They think they can run with the big dogs, but they don't know jack."

Will had to take another moment to process the information. If what DeShawn said was true, then Lena was right. She hadn't been the one to bring all of this down on them. Jared Long had. "Did Lena believe Jared?"

"I don't think so. At least Lee never said anything to me or the guys," DeShawn admitted. "But she's smart when she latches onto something. Jared puts a thought into her head, maybe she starts paying attention to things she didn't notice before. I had to keep her busy. She was all over the Waller thing. I knew she'd jump at the chance to take him out."

Will felt everything finally coming together. "So, Cayla tells you about the conversation at the doctor's office. You reach out to a pill pusher named Tony Dell. Tony gets arrested. He flips on Waller two hours later and gives Lena the evidence she needs to go into the shooting gallery."

"I know you think I'm stone cold, but I was trying to protect her." Franklin explained, "Lena busts Waller, she's covered up in paperwork for the next six months. I figured that'd run out the clock while she's pregnant, then maybe once she has the kid, she decides she wants to be a mommy and doesn't come back to the job."

Will wondered if there was a single man in Lena Adams's life who'd ever avoided taking risks for her. "Lena lost the baby."

"I know." Franklin seemed regretful. "Cayla called her, tried to get her to take some time off. She wouldn't listen. That girl never listens to nobody."

Will couldn't argue with that. "What about Jared?"

"What about him? He's writing tickets and sweeping broken windshield glass off the road. He can't start an investigation."

"Lonnie Gray wouldn't leave that loose end," Will guessed. He'd seen with his own eyes what a hard-ass the man could be. "You didn't tell him about the conversation at the doctor's office, right? Cayla did. And Gray was a lot more convinced than you were."

Franklin didn't answer, but they both knew that Cayla was that malicious. Franklin put a nicer spin on it, saying, "Cay dated Chuck for six years. Stuck by him when he was dying. She got close to Lonnie at the end. She cares about him."

Will bet she did. Cayla gravitated toward drama the way the tides gravitated toward the moon. "That's why you're here, as a favor to an old friend.”

“I can’t let her get locked up. I owe it to Chuck.”

Will knew there was a code, even among criminals, but he had a hard time thinking Cayla Martin was worthy. He said, “Lonnie sent the rednecks after Lena and Jared.”

Franklin nodded.

“He had them torture Eric Haigh to death.”

Franklin’s expression darkened. “Threw him out like a piece of trash.”

“Lonnie’s trying to clean house,” Will said. “You were attacked outside the theater last night. Somebody took a shot at Vickery. Tony Dell’s still out there. Big Whitey’s not going to stop until you’re all dead.”

“Lonnie’s not gonna touch me. He was looking for the little boys. He knew somebody found them in the basement. Both kids saw his face, knew who he was. I ain’t saying it’s right, just that it’s something that could come back on him.”

“Would that be a bad thing, letting all this come back on Lonnie? Stopping him from hurting more kids?”

Franklin shrugged, but he was obviously talking for a reason.

Will said, “You didn’t know about the kids until the raid.”

“And?”

“And you put the hit on Sid Waller and his team before you knew about the kids.” Will guessed the Big Whitey business model was being franchised after all.

Franklin said, “Things changed after Chuck died. Me and Lonnie weren’t so close. I thought it was the grief at first, but then I figured it was something else.”

“Waller and Lonnie were both pedophiles. They weren’t doing it for money. The only time Lonnie ever took a risk was when he was grooming a new kid.”

“You’re right,” Franklin said. “Only, I found out after Waller was dead that they were doing it together.”

“Stalking kids together?”

“Doing everything together.” DeShawn looked like he wanted to spit the bad taste out of his mouth. “Lonnie said it was the most fun he ever had.”

Will gathered the two men had had several lengthy conversations, none of which had been good for DeShawn Franklin. He said, “It started to fall apart before the raid. You knew something was wrong. You saw that Lonnie and Waller were getting close. You were worried Lonnie would pass on the business to Waller.”

Franklin snorted a laugh. “I wasn’t worried about it happening. I already knew it was going down. Lonnie told me before the raid. Before Cayla heard Jared. Before any of that shit started, he sat me down and told me it looked like Waller had a better handle on things. Wanted me to be a second to that redneck bastard. Pitched it like he was doing me a favor.” Franklin gave a bitter laugh. “I guess he didn’t love me like a son after all.”

Cayla Martin asked, “Who loved you?” She tromped down the stairs carrying a large suitcase. She’d packed it too full. She couldn’t hold on. The case bumped down the stairs and didn’t stop until it hit the front door.

Cayla didn’t seem to mind. She walked down the rest of the stairs, picking her way carefully on high heels. She was dressed up, or at least it seemed that way to Will. Her tight leather miniskirt looked brand-new and the matching silk blouse was cut so low that it showed the pink bow on her bra.

Franklin told her, “Wait in the car.”

“Nuh-uh.” She took a pack of cigarettes out of her purse. “I gotta say, Bud, you really fucked me over lettin’ Benji go like that.”

Will looked at Franklin, but the man didn’t offer an opinion.

She said, “I had a family in Germany ready to pay thirty grand for him.”

“Family?” Will didn’t know if she was deluded or naïve.

“Good thing I got that goddamn plane ticket now.” She put a cigarette in her mouth but didn’t light it. “Except for Shawn picking me up at the hospital, my happy ass would probably be in jail. Ain’t that right, hon?”

Franklin didn’t answer. He just sat on the sofa looking like he didn’t think he’d ever manage to get up. Part of him still had to be a cop. He’d tried to protect Lena. Paul Vickery had been tied up, not murdered. Franklin had done his best to keep Tony Dell’s name out of the story. And then there was the immutable fact that Will was still breathing.

DeShawn Franklin was finished with all of this. Maybe it was the kids. Maybe it was Lonnie Gray’s betrayal. Either way, he was done.

“Shit, Shawn.” Cayla seemed to sense his faltering resolve. She walked over to Franklin, teetering on her high heels. “You know you gotta do this.”

Franklin reached into his pocket. He pulled out his car keys. “Just leave it in the lot.”

“Oh, hell no.” Cayla’s head started shaking back and forth. “No, sir.”

Franklin said, “You’re leaving town. Whatever I end up doing is on me. It’s got nothing to do with you. I owe it to Chuck to make sure your name stays out of it.”

“She-it, you can’t do anything, Shawn, and I ain’t eatin’ Wiener schnitzel for the rest of my damn life.” Cayla flicked the lighter and touched the flame to her cigarette. “Come on. Just finish it. We ain’t got time for your conscience to work itself out.”

“I’m not going to—”

Cayla grabbed the Glock and shot Paul Vickery four times.

The gunfire reverberated in the small room. The air shook with the noise. Vickery’s body jerked violently as the bullets hit his back.

Will’s hands flew up in front of his face. His knees pulled in like some part of his brain thought he could roll himself into a ball and stop the bullets. He waited for Cayla to turn the gun on him. And waited.

Nothing happened.

Will peered up, expecting to find the Glock staring back at him.

Instead, he saw that Franklin had grabbed the gun away. He was breathing hard, though there obviously hadn’t been a struggle. “Fuck, Cayla!” he screamed. “What the fuck was that!” Franklin knelt down beside Vickery. He pressed his fingers to the man’s neck. “You killed him!”

“You’re welcome, motherfucker.” Cayla’s cigarette bobbed in her mouth. “I heard you upstairs, Shawn. You told them every damn thing that’s been going on. No wonder Lonnie didn’t wanna hand you over the business.”

“Shut up!” Franklin pointed the Glock at Cayla. “Just shut the fuck up!”

The cigarette dropped out of her mouth. “Get that gun outta my face.”

“I said shut up!” Franklin pressed the gun to Cayla’s chest. “I told you to let me handle this. I told you to just shut the fuck up for once in your miserable life and let me do what I know how to do.”

Cayla asked, “What’re you gonna do, Shawn? Turn state’s evidence? Go to the cops and tell them you’re sorry?”

“Stop talking.”

“You gonna shoot me in the chest, Shawn? That what you promised Chuck you was gonna do? Murder me?” Her words were strong, but she took a step back. “You know we gotta get rid of him or he’ll go straight to the cops.”

“He won’t go to the cops!” Franklin screamed. “He’s a con. He’s on parole!”

Will stared down at the floor so he didn’t give himself away. He had no idea why Franklin had maintained his cover.

And he would never find out.

Tony Dell pushed open the saloon doors to the kitchen. Will couldn’t guess how long he’d been standing there. He’d obviously heard enough.

Tony took three steps across the room and jammed his knife into Franklin’s neck.

Franklin’s mouth opened. He dropped the gun. He put one hand to his throat, tried to steady the handle of the knife with the other.

And then Tony pulled out the blade.

Blood shot out of the wound like a water pistol.

Franklin went down on one knee. He gasped for air. Will could hear his breath wheezing through the open slit in his neck.

Cayla said, “Jesus, Tony, finish it.”

Tony didn’t want to. He was soaking in the spectacle of Franklin’s death. The blood pouring out of his neck. The way his fingers quivered as he reached out for help. Franklin finally lost his balance. His whole body shifted, his knee slipping out from under him. His shoulder hit the floor. Blood pooled around his head. His fingers kept trembling. A pungent odor filled the air. His big chest rose for one last breath that he would never let go.

And then it was over.

“Damn,” Tony whispered. “I think he shit himself.”

Cayla slapped Tony on the back of the head. “How many times do I have to call you? I swear to God, I thought Shawn was gonna arrest me outside the hospital. I told you he wasn’t right with this.”

"You wanna stop your yapping and thank me for risking my neck to get here?" Tony wiped the knife blade on his jeans before shoving it into his boot. "They's twenty squad cars set up on the other side of the highway. I had to take the back way."

"Well, poor you." Cayla picked up her still-burning cigarette from the floor. She grabbed Franklin's Glock and tossed it into the kitchen. "Take care of Bud and bring my suitcase. If we gotta go the back roads, I'm gonna be late for my flight."

Tony said, "Shit, you don't gotta get there four hours ahead. That's for them, not you."

"You ever been on an international flight before?" she demanded. Tony's expression gave him away. "Just be quick, and don't forget to bring my suitcase." She opened the door, but didn't leave. She walked over to Will and jammed her fingers into his front pocket. He kept his body as still as he could. She pulled out the keys to Sara's BMW. "Might as well drive there in style."

Tony slapped her ass. "Hell yeah, baby."

Cayla gave Will a nasty look. Her voice went from her usual high-pitched singsong to a witch's snarl. "Make it hurt, baby. This asshole cost me thirty grand."

She slammed the door behind her.

In the silence, Will heard a clicking sound. He realized it was the breath stuttering in and out of his mouth.

Tony shook his head. "That gal is a piece of work, lemme tell ya."

Will said nothing. Twice now, he'd seen what Tony Dell was capable of. Watching Eric Haigh get stabbed, all Will could think was that he never wanted to go out that way. Now that he'd seen the alternative, he wasn't so sure.

Tony breathed out a heavy sigh. "Get up, Bud. I ain't gonna kill you on the floor."

Will struggled to get on his knees. Finally, Tony grabbed his arm and yanked him up. Will tried to pull away, but it was no use. His hands and feet were tied. He was trapped. He was going to die in this house, on this floor, beside Paul Vickery and DeShawn Franklin.

The only thing that brought him any peace was knowing that Benjamin was safe in the attic. He had Will's phone. They would trace him. They would take Benjamin to his brother. Both boys would be home soon.

But Sara would have nothing. Will was still legally married to Angie Polaski. The courts wouldn't care that Will hadn't seen her in months, that he'd hired a divorce lawyer to track her down. His wife had all claim to him—not just his body, but his memories. Angie had grown up with Will. By virtue of proximity, she knew more about him than anyone else on earth. She was his Pandora's box that only opened when it was time to mete out pain.

Sara had Will's dog, his toothbrush, and whatever clothes he'd left in her apartment.

"Welp." Tony slid the knife out of his boot. "Might as well get this over with." He held it up for Will to see. He'd obviously picked up the trick from the redneck. And as it had before, the trick worked. Will felt his gut clench.

Tony smiled at the effect. "You scared, Bud?"

Will tried to summon Bill Black. He couldn't let himself die a coward. "Go ahead and do it, man. Don't drag it out."

Tony had always been contrary. He lowered the knife. "I guess you pissed somebody off real good." He indicated Will's face. "Got two black eyes, broke nose. I know Junior didn't do that to you."

Will swallowed. His throat was still hurting. He thought about the whiskey Sara had forced him to drink. She was right. It had made him feel better. Everything she did made him feel so much better.

Tony asked, "Who tore into you, Bud?"

Will knew Tony wanted an answer. This wasn't part of the killing game. "The cop. He caught up with me last night. Sucker punched me." He looked at Paul Vickery. "Guess he won't do it again."

Tony laughed. "Thass a good'un, Bud. I guess he won't." He used the knife to clean under his fingernails. The blade dug into the skin under his thumb. Instead of flinching, Tony watched the blood bead up. "Where'd you get that fancy car?"

Sara's BMW. Her registration was in the glove compartment. "Stole it off a woman in the cafeteria."

"That right?"

"She left her keys on the table. I went out into the parking lot and pressed the button until I found it."

"That's a good trick. I'll have to keep that in mind." Tony hefted the knife in his hand, then started flipping it end over end. "I was wonderin' about somethin', Bud." He glanced over his shoulder as if he wanted to make sure they were alone. "I ain't queer or nothin', but I seen you done some grooming." He explained, "Back at the club, when Denny made you pull your shorts down?"

Will shook his head. "What?"

"Seems to me, a man don't groom hisself like that unless he's doin' it for a woman. Am I right?"

Will swallowed again. He couldn't accept that he was going to die talking about his genitals.

Tony kept flipping the knife. "Cayla talked me into shavin' my balls once. They itched so bad I near 'bout scratched 'em off." He shrugged. "I guess it's better what you did?"

Will couldn't tell if he was asking a question or making an observation.

Tony caught the knife by the handle. He smiled, like he'd just figured something out. "You're still sweet on that lady up in Tennessee, ain't ya?"

Will tried to summon up a Bill Black answer, but then he remembered that this was exactly the kind of death a man like Bill Black would face. "Yes," Will said. "I'm in love with her. That's where I was heading—up to Tennessee. I don't want my kid growing up without his daddy."

"That's what I thought," Tony said. "You was just trying to make her jealous, wasn't you? Going out with Cayla like that."

Will nodded. "Yes."

"You came here to tell Cayla that, right? That nothin' was gonna happen?"

"I know she's your girl, Tony." Will grasped for an excuse to explain why he was here. "I heard at the hospital they were looking for her. I came here to tell her that she might wanna lay low for a while. I was looking out for her in case you couldn't."

Tony's jaw twisted to the side as he considered the excuse. Finally, he decided, "You're a real gentleman, Bud, lookin' out for her like that. I always knew you was good." He paused. "What's this about you leaving town?"

Will tried not to flinch as he swallowed. "I was heading up to Tennessee right after I checked on Cayla for you. There's nothing in Macon for me."

"That right?" Tony asked. "You was gonna skip out on your parole?"

"Heat's too much around here. Too many dead cops. Just a matter of time before the pigs try to pin it all on me."

"You could always turn."

"I don't snitch on my friends. And I won't—" Will cut himself off before he started begging. Tony liked to hear people beg. "I wanna see my kid grow up. No reason for me to ever come back here again."

"That's real sweet, Bud. I bet you woulda made a good daddy."

"It's all I ever wanted," Will lied. There were too many bad things that could happen to children for Will to ever want one of his own. Still, he told Tony, "My daddy ran out on me when I was a kid. I don't want to do that to mine."

Tony studied him carefully. He finally said, "My daddy ran out on me, too."

Every muscle in Will's throat strained to keep the conversation going, to create some fictional fairy tale about the woman in Tennessee, their wonderful lives together.

But Will knew it was too late. Tony was done listening. He was trying to make a decision. Will could tell by the way his eyes scanned back and forth as if he could read Will's mind.

Finally, Tony sheathed his knife back in his boot. "Be careful on them mountain roads."

Will felt his lips part. Just like that, the good ol' boy Tony was back.

"I hear Tennessee's real pretty." Tony walked toward the door, then he remembered Cayla's suitcase. He had to grab the handle with both hands. "Shit, she's got just about every damn thing in the house packed in here."

Will didn't speak.

Tony said, "I like you, Bud. It's a shame I ain't never gonna see you again." He gave Will a hard look. "Right?" Will nodded furiously. "Right."

Tony dragged Cayla's suitcase out the front door. He didn't bother closing it behind him.

Will felt his body sway as he listened to the suitcase scrape against the porch. It banged against the concrete steps, then scratched down the driveway.

They couldn't work Sara's keyfob. The panic alarm went off, but they managed to stop the piercing siren before it got too loud. A door opened and closed, then another one. A few seconds later, a door opened and closed again.

The engine turned over. The tires screeched as Tony stepped on the gas.

Slowly, Will's body adjusted to the fact that he wasn't going to be stabbed to death. He had to lean on his hands and drag his knees behind him in order to get to the front door. He saw the brake lights on Sara's BMW glow as Tony roared out of the subdivision.

Will sat back on his heels. He closed his eyes and just breathed. His heart was pounding so hard that he could almost feel it tapping against his ribs.

Benjamin.

The boy was still in the attic.

Will didn't want to call for him in case Tony changed his mind. Besides, Will's hands and feet were bound. He couldn't exactly run up the stairs and catch the kid when he jumped down through the hatch.

And there were two dead bodies down here. Benjamin had seen enough bad things to last him a lifetime.

Paul Vickery was lying on his side. The gouge in his head had stopped bleeding. His wrists were bright red where the twine cut into his flesh.

Will pressed his hands to the floor and dragged his knees, thinking he was moving like a caterpillar. It was hard to believe that he'd told the boy that football joke just a few hours ago. He was probably at Grady Hospital by now. So was Sara. She was safe. That was all that ever really mattered.

Will stopped beside Vickery's body. He checked the man's pockets for his cell phone. He found a wallet, a set of car keys, and a handful of change, but no phone. Will patted Vickery's chest. There was something hard underneath his shirt.

Vickery groaned, and Will jerked back like a snake had tried to strike.

"'Uck." Vickery pulled down the gag. He cursed a few more times as he loosened his collar. Will could see the black Kevlar vest underneath his shirt. "What the hell happened?"

"You got shot." Will checked Vickery's back. Four flattened bullets were lodged in the vest.

“By you?” Vickery asked.

“No.” Will sat back on his knees again. “I saw you on the road talking to Tony Dell last night.”

Vickery blinked, like he couldn’t understand. “No, you didn’t.”

“White Honda. You were pulled up by Tony’s truck.”

“Do you know how many white Hondas there are on the road?” Vickery tried to roll over onto his back. “Why didn’t you tell me you were a cop?”

“I was too busy getting the shit kicked out of me.”

Vickery chuckled, like it was a fond memory. And then he looked at DeShawn Franklin and his face fell. “I trusted that bastard with my life.”

Will didn’t say he was probably right to. “Where’s your phone?”

“Front pocket.” Vickery tried to reach down, but the twine stopped him.

Will knew the pocket was empty, anyway.

Reluctantly, he crawled over to Franklin’s body. The blood had stopped pumping along with his heart. The wound in his neck had slowed to a dribble. Will tried not to shudder as he searched the body. His wrists being practically glued together didn’t make the task easy. An eternity passed before he found the phone in Franklin’s shirt pocket.

Will backed away from the dead man before he even looked at the phone. By necessity, he held it in both hands. His thumb swiped the screen. Instead of a keypad, a microphone icon flashed up. The red button below it was flashing. There was a clock counting off the seconds, and below that, a flat line like on a heart monitor.

The line bobbed up and down when Will told Vickery, “I think he recorded us.”

Vickery shook his head, but didn’t answer.

Twelve minutes, twenty-three seconds. That’s how long the recorder had been running. Franklin must’ve started it when Will woke up from his Taser fugue.

Vickery said, “You gonna call somebody or what?”

Will pressed the red button. The timer stopped. He wasn’t familiar with the phone’s operating system, but they were all pretty much the same. He touched his thumb to the icon of a house. He touched the symbol with a telephone receiver. The keypad rolled up. Will dialed Faith's number. He rested his hand on his face as he waited for the connection to go through.

She answered on the first ring. "Franklin, what is it?"

"It's me," Will told her. "I'm at Cayla's house."

"Will?" Faith's voice trilled up. "We've got sixty cops combing the woods for you. We can't pinpoint your phone."

"You need to put an APB on Sara's car. Tony Dell and Cayla Martin stole it. They're headed toward the Atlanta airport, taking the back roads. International terminal. She's going to Germany."

Faith didn't bother to cover the phone as she shouted orders to her team. As soon as she finished, she asked Will, "What about Benjamin?"

"He's safe." Will looked at Paul Vickery. He still didn't trust the man. "What about the other thing?"

"They're at Grady. Sara called over an hour ago. They're both fine."

Will felt relief flood his senses.

Faith said, "The boy started talking in the ambulance. His name is Aaron Winsor. Amanda was right. His parents live in Newfoundland. They were going through a bad custody battle. The father was on a fishing trip. The mom thought he'd abducted the boys. The police were about to arrest him." Faith seemed to realize she was talking too fast. She slowed down her words. "The parents are on their way to Atlanta right now. Jesus, Will. You had me scared to death."

"Hold on." Will couldn't stay on his knees any longer. He didn't want to sit down, so he pushed himself up against the wall. Vickery's eyes tracked his every movement. They both heard sirens in the distance.

Will asked, "How far out are the cruisers?"

Faith said, "Five minutes, tops. Call Sara."

"She's probably busy."

"Don't be an idiot."

Will heard a click as she hung up the phone. He glanced at Paul Vickery. The man was still on his back, his elbows and knees bent at an uncomfortable angle.

Vickery asked, "You gonna help me here? This hurts like a bitch."

"It certainly looks painful." Will felt some give in the twine that was digging into his ankles. After a few unsuccessful shuffles, he hopped toward the kitchen.

"Where're you going?" Vickery shouted. "Come back here!"

Will didn't stop until the saloon doors flapped behind him. He leaned against the counter to catch his breath. And also to catch himself, because hopping around was harder than it looked.

DeShawn Franklin's phone had gone back to screensaver mode. The picture showed two little girls dressed in Mickey Mouse ears. Will didn't want to think about someone telling the man's nieces what had happened. He swiped the screen and dialed Sara's number.

She was used to getting strange calls on her hospital phone. Still, her tone was strained when she answered, "Dr. Linton."

Will said, "I'm okay," in a voice that sounded exactly the opposite.

"Are you sure?"

"Yeah." Now that he had her on the line, Will felt it all start to catch up to him. Sara had literally saved him by the short hairs.

"Will?"

"Everything's fine." He made his voice stronger. "I'm just a little tied up at the moment." He stopped himself from laughing at his own joke, mostly because he was pretty sure Sara wouldn't find it that funny. "I don't know about your car, though."

"Sweetheart, do you think I give a damn about my car?"

Will hoped she still felt the same when she turned on the news and saw her BMW being tracked up I-75. "Are you at the hospital?"

"I'm at home. Denise gave me a lift while Amanda interviewed the boy. She's going back to Grady to stay with Aaron until his parents are there. Did Faith tell you?"

"Yes." Will closed his eyes. He liked thinking about Sara being safe at home. "What are you doing?"

"Lying on the couch. I was going to take a shower, but I feel like I've been run over by a truck. I'm too sore to move."

Will thought about the night before. "Sore from me?"

"A little," she allowed. "When do you think you'll be back in Atlanta?"

"I'm driving back tonight." Will decided at that moment that he would quit his job if that was the only way to make it happen. "I'll call you when I'm ten minutes out." He covered the bottom part of the phone with his hand, an easy task considering there was no daylight between his wrists. Still, he lowered his voice, telling Sara, "I want you to fill the bathtub when I call."

She sounded surprised, but said, "Okay."

"When I get there, I want you to get in the tub with me."

Her "Okay" was very different this time.

"Then we're going to talk."

Her voice changed again. "Just talk?"

"I'm going to answer every question you ask me."

"Every question?" she repeated. "The water will go cold."

"We'll keep it warm," he told her. "I mean it, Sara. No more secrets." Will looked out the kitchen window. He saw a police cruiser kicking up dust in the distance. His resolve started to slip. Will felt like he was stepping out onto a tightrope. His hands were so slick he could barely hold the phone.

Still, he managed to say the one thing he should've told her in the first place. "I trust you."

Sara didn't speak, but he could hear her breath through the phone.

Will felt his throat start to tighten. He should probably hang up. He wanted to hang up. But he asked, "What do you think? Does that sound good?"

"Baby." She sighed out the word. "I think that sounds like the perfect way to start the rest of our lives."

17.

MACON, GEORGIA

FIVE DAYS LATER

Lena sat across the table from yet another Internal Affairs investigator. Brock Patterson's black-and-white ensemble reminded her of the woman who'd investigated her the week before. Lena wondered whether there was a departmental dress code or if they all secretly worked night shifts at Olive Garden. If their pay was commensurate with Lena's, it wasn't a stretch.

"Detective Adams?" Patterson said. He'd obviously asked a question. Lena had stopped paying attention when she'd figured out the repetitive code to his interrogation. Every twenty minutes, he reset, asking the same questions he'd asked before, but using different inflections, different phrasing.

When did you find the boy?

You found the boy when?

Where was the boy when you found him?

The boy. Aaron Winsler. He was safe now, but they were all too terrified to say his name on the record.

If Lena was being honest, she never wanted to think about the boy again. Not out of spite, but out of self-preservation. She'd spent four days rehashing every horrible detail of the shooting gallery—the dead bodies, the cold fear that sat in the pit of her belly when she stared down Sid Waller. And then the worst part, the part that she'd left out during the first investigation—finding the boy.

Lena still had nightmares about pulling back that panel in the basement, seeing those two terrified eyes staring back at her.

Aaron's pupils had been black as coal, set in a field of reddish white. He hadn't said a word when Lena lifted him out of the hole. He'd felt so light. Like a blanket. Lena had cradled him in her arms, cooing to him. She'd never had a maternal bone in her body, but with Aaron, it came naturally. She stroked his hair. Kissed her lips to his dry forehead. Her hand on his back felt the rapid thump-thump-thump of his heart, and she thought of her little bean, forever captured on that ultrasound file she kept on her computer at the office.

"Detective Adams?" Patterson said. "Could you please focus?"

"Can't you just look back at your notes and write down what I told you the first time?"

"The first time you were interviewed or the first time you told the truth?"

Point taken.

Lena sat back in her chair. It was uncomfortable by design. The room was cold, painted cinder blocks with scuff marks around the vinyl baseboard. She stared at the mirror behind Patterson, wondering who was watching. Her last run-in with the rat squad had taken place in the conference room. Lena guessed with Lonnie Gray sitting in jail, the whole force was being treated differently.

There was a half-empty bottle of Coke on the table. Lena took a long sip before putting it back down. "Tell me why this happened."

Patterson's mouth turned down. He looked like the living embodiment of a frowny-faced emoticon.

Lena said, "No one will tell me why Jared and I were attacked. Was it because of the boy? Did they think I knew where he was?"

Predictably, Patterson wouldn't yield. "It's my job to ask the questions."

"Is it really my job to answer them?" Lena asked. She was sick of not knowing. It was all she could think about. What had she done to bring this down on them? What stupid mistake had she made? What asshole had she pissed off?

She told Patterson, "My husband was almost killed. I was attacked in my home. Don't you think I deserve to know why?"

"My colleague is investigating the attack. As you know, you and I are here on a different matter." Patterson had the poker face of a banker denying a loan. "Your cooperation would go a long way toward—”

“Toward what?” she interrupted. “I wasn’t involved in any of this. I did what my commanding officer told me to do.”

“You lied under oath.”

“Did I?” Lena smiled. She’d been too careful for that. The first investigator hadn’t asked about the boy. As far as Lena knew, there was no law that said you had to volunteer information.

Patterson sat back in his chair, obviously trying to mimic her relaxed demeanor. “We’re both on the same side, Detective Adams.” He tried to sound reasonable, though they both knew he had skin in this game. He’d be looking at a big promotion if he could weed out a few more bad cops, and the man had made it clear from the beginning that he didn’t trust Lena. “We just want to make sure the case against Mr. Gray holds. It seems to me we share the same goal here.”

“Mr. Gray,” Lena echoed. No one was calling him Chief anymore. No one was laying claim to him at all. “My goal is to get back to my husband. He’s better, by the way. Thanks for your concern.”

Patterson tucked his chin into his chest. He did this whenever Lena pushed back, a physical manifestation of hitting a brick wall. He let out a short puff of air, then stacked together some papers on the table. “I’ll be just a minute.” He stood up. “Feel free to take a bathroom break if you need one.”

Lena gave him a salute as he left the room. He was obviously going to confer with whoever was behind the one-way mirror. She guessed it was Amanda Wagner. The deputy director would count arresting Lonnie Gray as a feather in her cap, though the truth was that Will Trent deserved the credit. He was the one who’d risked his life.

He was also the one who’d kept Lena from killing a man.

While Lena was no stranger to having blood on her hands, taking on the two rednecks who’d broken into her house had been different. If she thought about it too long, the bloodlust came back. She could feel it boiling up into the back of her throat. Her muscles tensed. Her hands clenched. Even standing in the ICU over Jared’s bed, Lena had struggled with the impulse to go one floor down and finish the job on the monster who’d wanted to kill her husband.

Not that he’d succeeded.

By some miracle, the doctor said that Jared was going to make a full recovery. He was looking at a few months of physical therapy, but his otherwise good health and youth had been on his side. Of course, now the same two things were working against him. Jared had been home less than thirty-six hours and he was already going stir-crazy—staying up too much, moving around too much, getting in her business too much.

She was tempted to send him to his mother's. Lena didn't hate the woman as much now, maybe because Darnell Long was the only reason Lena had a functioning kitchen. Fortunately, Jared's mother seemed to understand that their truce was only as strong as the miles between them. She had already made one trip back to Alabama. If Lena was lucky, Nell wouldn't return to Macon until the trial.

Not that Lena thought there would be a trial. Just this morning, Fred Zachary, the second shooter, had taken a deal in exchange for giving up the rednecks at Tipsie's. The rednecks weren't talking, but it was probably just a matter of time before they decided to play ball.

That left Tony Dell, and Mr. Snitch had made it clear he didn't want a deal. He admitted to being on the street the night Jared was shot. He admitted to stabbing Eric and DeShawn to death. He corroborated everything DeShawn had told Will Trent about Big Whitey and Sid Waller. Basically, he'd thrown everybody under the bus, including himself. It wouldn't be long before someone decided Dell should stop talking. Lena figured he was planning his own suicide. The fact was that Tony Dell had nothing to lose.

The Atlanta police had caught up with Dell and Cayla Martin outside the international terminal at Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson Airport. Dell was obviously a psychopath, but he was also a survivor. He'd known the gig was up. He'd raised his hands and gotten out of the car.

Cayla Martin wouldn't go so easy. She'd jumped behind the wheel and tried to outrun the police. Unfortunately, she'd run in the wrong direction. Lena wondered what was going through the nurse's mind when she saw the shuttle bus speeding straight toward her. According to the accident report, there were about two seconds between the time Martin tried to turn the wheel and the head-on collision. Lena knew what it felt like when you thought you were about to die. Two seconds was an eternity.

Martin wasn't wearing a seatbelt. Probably another second passed as she flew headfirst into the shuttle bus and snapped her neck on one of the seatbacks.

Lena couldn't help but think that the sweetest part of that story was not Martin's brutal death, but the fact that Sara Linton's sixty-five-thousand-dollar BMW had been turned into the world's most expensive Rubik's Cube.

Laughter tickled Lena's throat as she pushed herself up from the chair. She started pacing the room, forcing herself not to count off the steps because she already knew the space was twelve feet across by ten feet deep. She looked up at the camera. She smiled, though she felt the snarl in her teeth. She wanted to get through the pile of paperwork on her desk. She wanted to check on Jared. She wanted to go home and do the things that made her feel like a normal person: clean the house top to bottom, do the laundry, tend to her garden in the front yard. Winter was just around the corner. Lena should probably pull out the petunias, but she didn't have it in her to let anything die just now.

She'd been to too many funerals lately.

DeShawn Franklin's body had been unceremoniously cremated at a facility outside of Macon. Other than the mortician, Lena was the only person in attendance. His sister didn't want her children there. His ex-wife wouldn't speak his name and his current wife wouldn't show her face in public. Jared hadn't wanted Lena to go, but he didn't try to stop her, either. She had made a lot of mistakes in her life. She figured DeShawn had tried to do right at the end. He'd turned on that recorder on his phone. Lena didn't know everything that the recording had captured—nobody at the station did—but apparently, DeShawn had given Will Trent enough evidence to bring down Big Whitey's organization. That detail alone earned DeShawn one pair of clear eyes watching him go to his maker.

Eric Haigh's interment had been markedly different. The state had cleared him just before the burial yesterday morning, so he'd been given a proper send-off with officers in dress uniforms and a full police escort. Lena guessed she wasn't the only cop there thinking that the last funeral they'd all attended was Chuck Gray's. Lonnie's son had died of leukemia three months ago. Lena had cried at Chuck's ceremony—not because she liked Chuck, who was the kind of spoiled asshole you'd expect of the chief's son—but because she'd felt so bad for Lonnie Gray.

She imagined Lonnie was feeling very sorry for himself right now. He had an excellent law firm fighting the charges against him, but as smart as Lonnie was, he'd made one enormous mistake. Lena figured it was arrogance that had brought him down. Lonnie never considered the possibility that the GBI would seize his home computer. Even without the murders, kidnappings, and trafficking, the state had found enough child porn on the chief's hard drive to send him away for a hundred years.

Stupid, sick bastard.

Last month, Lena had run a 10K with Lonnie. They were raising money for leukemia research. Lonnie had thirty years on her, but he'd beaten her to the finish line. Lena relished the thought of his strong heart ticking away as he marked off prison time for the rest of his miserable life. She hoped some big, nasty con did to Lonnie Gray exactly what he'd done to Marie Sorensen and all those other poor kids. Lena hoped they did it to him every second of every day until Lonnie fell over from exhaustion. And then she hoped they picked him back up and started all over again.

Lena wanted to think Lonnie's imprisonment would help Marie Sorensen's mom and the Winsor family sleep better at night, but she knew from experience that some demons never went away.

The door opened again. Patterson stood with his hand on the knob. He didn't enter the room. He looked highly annoyed, which told her everything she needed to know.

Lena said, "I guess the rat didn't get his cheese."

She didn't wait for Patterson's response. She brushed past him, flashing her teeth the same as she had for the camera. Lena knew that she shouldn't push it, that she hadn't gotten away with anything, but anytime you left the rat squad with your badge intact was a reason to celebrate.

Lena felt her smile abruptly drop when she saw Denise Branson standing in the hallway. She had known that Denise was in the building, but Lena had prayed like hell that she would never have to see the woman again. Not that Lena had ever had a prayer answered before in her life.

Nor had she ever seen Denise Branson so obviously uncomfortable. It was hard to look at. She shuffled from one foot to another. She wouldn't look Lena in the eye. There was an air of humiliation about her, as if she'd been beaten down so many times over the last four days that she'd forgotten what it was like to get back up.

Patterson said, "Ms. Branson?"

His tone had a snarky edge to it that Lena didn't like. If the man had kept silent, Lena probably would've never spoken to Denise again. As it was, she asked the woman, "You need a bathroom break?"

Denise was obviously surprised by the question. Still, she nodded, and they both headed toward the one place Brock Patterson couldn't follow them. Lena saw the disappointed look on his face as the door to the ladies' room closed.

Denise got right to the point. Her voice had the practiced tone of somebody who was used to apologizing. "I'm sorry. I've got no excuse for what I did to you."

Lena prompted, "But?"

"No buts." Denise seemed resolute. There was none of her usual self-assured swagger. "I misled you about the boy. I dragged you into this without your knowledge. I've got the rat squad looking at you when you didn't do anything wrong."

Lena asked the question. "Is that why they tried to kill me and Jared, because they thought I knew where the boy was?"

Denise shook her head, then shrugged. "I don't know, Lee. It doesn't make sense that they'd go after y'all instead of me."

Lena kept coming to the same conclusion. She was a dog chasing its tail. "Who else did you tell about the boy?"

"Friends. People I could trust."

"I thought I was a friend you could trust."

This time, Denise had an excuse. "I thought I was protecting you."

"That's a lie," Lena said. "You didn't trust anybody at work. Not me, not Lonnie. You knew something was wrong. You thought there was a mole, and you thought it could be anybody from the top down."

Denise let out a heavy sigh. She looked like she couldn't muster the strength to argue anymore.

Lena asked, "Did you suspect Lonnie was Big Whitey?"

"I don't know," she admitted. Lena could tell from her expression that this was the truth. "It seemed odd that Big Whitey was getting tipped off. I thought maybe it was one of Lonnie's secretaries or somebody on your team.”

“Or me?”

Denise’s gaze settled somewhere behind Lena. “I didn’t think so, but the stakes were too high for that kind of risk.”

Lena studied Denise Branson, thinking not for the first time that she was looking at herself five years ago. The old Lena would’ve absolutely tried to go it alone. She didn’t trust anybody. She didn’t lean on anybody. She never asked for help. She thought there was only one person in the entire world who could do things the right way. Even today, all those tendencies were still there. Lena spent a good deal of her time battling her baser impulses. Sometimes she won. A lot of times she still lost. She consoled herself with the knowledge that at least she was trying.

Lena said, “I heard Lonnie was in the mayor’s office when they grabbed him. Took him straight out the front door of city hall so God and everybody could see him.”

Denise grinned, obviously familiar with the story. “That blonde chick’s the one who arrested him. Agent Mitchell. I bet she kept her foot up his ass the whole time.”

Lena didn’t doubt it. “If Lonnie was half the man he claimed to be, he’d find a way to kill himself, save the courts the trouble.”

“Give me a damn shiv, I’ll do it myself.”

“Get in line.” Lena blew out a long breath “I can’t waste anymore of my time on that bastard. How’re the boys doing?”

Denise’s face lit up with something that could only be described as pure joy. “They’re good, Lee. I put Aaron in his mama’s arms myself. He’s surrounded by family. He’s back with his brother. It’s gonna be tough, but they’ve all got each other.”

Again, Lena got the strange sensation of looking at herself. All those balls juggled in the air were worth it when you managed to keep them going. Watching them fly brought a bigger rush than any drug on the street. Of course, the high never lasted. No one could keep juggling that many balls for long. The first time one of them dropped, you wanted to die. The second time, you felt bad. The third and fourth times, you just found another ball to throw up into the air and moved on.

Lena had dropped so many balls in her lifetime that she’d lost count.

She told Denise, “I forgive you.”

Denise looked surprised, then wary. “Why?”

"I have no idea," Lena confessed. She was living proof that second chances worked, but she'd never been able to extend that courtesy to anyone else. Losing Jeffrey Tolliver had taught her a lot of things, but the possibility of losing Jared had floored her.

Denise asked, "You wanna think about it?"

"No." Lena offered the naked, unadorned truth. "DeShawn and Eric are dead. Lonnie turned out to be Satan. Paul's put in an application for the Atlanta PD. Jared almost died." Lena felt a lump in her throat. She left her little bean off the list, but the memory was still raw. "I guess I can't afford to lose anybody else."

Denise was still skeptical. "It's probably my fault you and Jared almost got killed. I could've gotten you fired. It's only through the grace of God that those assholes in IA believe your story."

"You think they believe me?" Lena laughed. "The only reason I'm not on the street or in a jail cell is they can't prove anything." She walked to the sink and turned on the faucet. The water was ice cold. Lena bent down and drank from the tap.

Denise said, "I've been a bad friend to you. I know that." Her voice went low. "And I know you've been going through some things. Before all this, I mean."

Lena turned off the faucet. Denise wasn't the only one with trust issues. It had never occurred to Lena to talk to anybody about losing the baby—not to Jared, not to Denise, not even to herself. Truthfully, it felt like too much of a failure, something she should be ashamed of.

And even if it didn't feel that way, Lena wasn't about to pour out her heart in the women's toilet at the police station.

She told Denise, "It's all right. It's something I had to go through on my own."

"I get that." Denise wasn't one to sit around gazing at her navel, either. "I'm here if you want to talk, though."

Lena looked down at her hand. It was resting on the sink instead of pressed to her empty belly. She wondered if that's how it happened—incrementally. The nurse from Dr. Benedict's office had been right about one thing: it didn't go away, but it got different.

Lena let out another long breath. She looked at the mirror over the sink, thinking she'd aged about twenty years since this all started. "Jared's been bugging the shit out of me. I could use an excuse to get out of the house.”

Denise caught Lena’s gaze in the mirror. “Me, too.”

Lena waited.

Denise cleared her throat. She struggled to speak. “Her name’s Lila. We’ve been dating for a while.”

Lena didn’t push it. “How long is IA gonna keep you here?”

“Long as it takes.”

“Call me when you’re finished. We’ll go to Barney’s.”

Denise looked away. The beaten-down expression was back. Barney’s was a cop bar. She obviously didn’t want to be seen by the men she used to command.

“You know what?” Lena grabbed a handful of paper towels. “As far as I can tell, you were the only cop on this entire force who saw something was wrong with Lonnie. You saved that kidnapped boy’s life. You kept him hidden and safe. You made sure he got home to his family. You gave Marie Sorensen’s mother a face to the name. You took a vicious predator off the streets. You wrapped all of this up in a pretty bow for the state to untie.” She tossed the paper towels into the trash. “Am I right? You did all that?”

“That’s one way to phrase it.”

“As far as I’m concerned, that’s the only way to phrase it to any asshole who asks.”

Denise shook her head. She saw where this was going. “IA isn’t gonna see me as a hero, Lee. They’re gonna fire my ass as soon as it hits the chair.”

“Then you tell them you’ll go straight to whichever news station will take you. Hell, go to the nationals. Go up to Canada. Tell them what you did to save that boy, and then let the Macon PD explain why they fired you for it.” Lena laughed at the thought. “If they need somebody to corroborate your story, give them my number.”

Denise stared openly. “You are one crazy bitch. You know that?”

“Maybe.” Lena rested her hand on the door, but didn’t open it. “I’ve been exactly where you are right now too many times not to know how to dig out of it.”

“You really think that’s gonna work?”

“Never underestimate the modern police force’s aversion to bad publicity,” Lena said, thinking she should put that on a plaque by her office door. "Don't let them hit your pension. That's what they'll go after first. Don't let them bust your rank to anything lower than detective." Lena smiled as she thought of something. "What do you think Paul's odds are getting onto the Atlanta PD?"

Denise smiled, too. "White male, ex-military? They'll roll out the red carpet."

"Either way, I'll need a new partner."

"Little salt and pepper?"

"More like Chico and the Man." Lena held open the door. Her smile dropped for the second time that day.

Will Trent was leaning against the wall. His face was a mess. Black and blue bruises were punctuated by dark red spots that were about the size of a grown man's knuckles.

Lena told Denise, "Call me about that beer."

"You got it." Denise didn't look at Will as she headed toward the interrogation room. Patterson was standing sentry in the doorway. He glared at Lena. She resisted the urge to stick out her tongue at him.

Will waited until Denise had shut the door. He told Lena, "I see Jared's out and about." She must've looked confused, because he said, "I just saw him go into the locker room."

Lena felt her jaw clench. She was going to kill Jared. After all her stupid husband had survived, she was going to strangle him with her bare hands.

Will nodded down the hall toward Denise. "She going to be okay?"

"What do you think?" Lena asked. She wasn't being belligerent. The state would have a lot of sway in Denise's case.

Will said, "I think the department has enough bad press without pissing off somebody like Denise Branson."

Lena wondered how much Will had heard standing out in the hallway. "She seems ready to take her medicine."

"In my experience, people like that don't generally stay down for the count." He stared his meaning into her. They both knew Lena had a habit of rising from the ashes.

"Right." Lena looked at her watch, though the only thing on her immediate agenda was to drag her idiot husband home by the collar. "I'll let you get back to work."

"I'm already finished. I was waiting to talk to you."

Lena felt dread flood through her body. "About what?"

“To tell you that you were right.”

She laughed, thinking this was some kind of joke. “Right about what?”

“The attack. IA wanted me to wait until you were cleared to tell you.”

Lena wasn’t laughing anymore. “Tell me what?”

“It wasn’t your fault. The reason those two men went to your house that night was because Jared said something at your doctor’s office.”

Lena couldn’t make sense of the words. It was like he was speaking Japanese.

Will explained, “Cayla Martin was filling in for one of the nurses at Dr. Benedict’s office while you were there. She overheard Jared talking about Big Whitey.”

Lena’s mouth didn’t just open in surprise. Her jaw practically grazed the floor. Cayla Martin. The name had sounded familiar when Lena first heard it three days ago, but she’d never in a million years put it together. “I thought she just worked at the hospital. That she was Tony Dell’s stepsister.”

“She did part-time work at Dr. Benedict’s office.” Will spoke carefully, like he was explaining it to a child. “Cayla overheard Jared telling you that Lonnie Gray was Big Whitey.”

“No.” Lena felt a dry laugh scratch her throat. The conversation sounded more and more like a really bad joke. “He wasn’t serious.”

“Cayla felt differently. She told DeShawn Franklin, who said it was probably nothing, and then she told Lonnie Gray, who put out a hit on you and your husband.”

None of this made sense. “How did she—”

“Cayla was dating Chuck Gray before he died of leukemia. She was close to Lonnie. Or, as close as two people like that can be.” Will put his hands in his pockets. “You want my personal theory, I think she was just one of those women who likes stirring things up.”

Lena felt her head shaking even as her brain tried to process the information. She remembered the doctor’s visit. She remembered Jared talking shit. And she remembered taking him seriously for just a brief moment before dismissing his theory like she dismissed every jackass theory that came out of his mouth.

All she could manage was, “I don’t believe you.”

"Why not?" Will asked. "It's the truth." There was no smile on his face, no indication that he was about to reveal the punch line. "It wasn't your fault. I wouldn't say it was Jared's fault, either. It's just something that happened."

Lena pressed her back against the wall. She'd been racking her brain trying to figure out where she'd gone wrong, what she'd done, and in the end, she was completely blameless. "I just assumed ..." Lena shook her head again. She was turning into a bobblehead doll. "I thought it was something to do with work."

"That's a reasonable assumption," Will agreed. "We all thought it was work-related. But it wasn't."

"We were ..." She let her voice trail off. Lena couldn't say the most startling part of all: On the street, you expected bad things to happen. They had been in her doctor's office. Lena had thought they were safe.

She told Will, "I don't even remember meeting her. I've seen her face all over the news and it never even crossed my mind." She felt a jolt from a distant memory. "I think she even called me on the phone."

Will said, "If it helps any, you've really annoyed my partner. She's spent her professional career saying there's no such thing as coincidence."

Lena kept shaking her head. She'd never believed in coincidences, either.

"So," Will said. "Any questions?"

Lena could only think of one. "Does Sara know it wasn't my fault?"

He hesitated, but told her, "Yes."

Lena didn't even try to fight the smile on her lips. "And she knows that you're down here telling me?"

"Yes."

"She didn't try to stop you?"

"I should head back to Atlanta." Will pushed away from the wall, obviously uneasy with the subject. "I'm glad everything worked out for you and Jared."

She couldn't let him leave. "Why didn't you just call me? Or email me?"

He gave her a knowing look. "You always come out better when we're off the record."

Lena didn't have to ask for clarification. Her memory flashed up that night in the house when she'd held the hammer over her head. Jared was bleeding out on the floor. One man was already dead. Even now, the bruise on Lena's knee was still tender where she'd dropped her full weight onto Fred Zachary's spine. If she thought about it hard enough, she could hear the crack of bone echoing in her ears.

Georgia's Castle Doctrine law provided that any man or woman could use deadly force against an intruder so long as they believed their life was in danger.

Will Trent knew just as well as Lena that Fred Zachary had no longer been a threat.

He gave a slight bow, his only acknowledgment of the truth between them. "Until next time."

"There's not going to be a next time."

"Lena." He sounded almost wistful. "I really hope you're right."

Will kept his hands in his pockets as he walked away. Lena remembered the first time she'd met him. With his three-piece suits and mild manner, he was more like an undertaker than a cop. In Lena's quest to learn from her mistakes, Will Trent was up there with the big life lessons. That undertaker had almost sent her to prison.

And not without good reason.

Lena gave Will enough time to leave the building before she approached the interrogation room door. She listened carefully, but couldn't hear anything. Denise had a quiet voice and Brock Patterson had the dulcet tones of an ancient nun. Lena pressed her palm to the door as an act of silent solidarity. So many times, Lena had been on the other side of that door. So many times, she'd known in her heart that no one was waiting on the other side.

"Hey."

She spun around, surprised to find Jared behind her. The shock wore off quickly. "You dumbass. What are you doing up here? How did you—"

He kissed her in a sloppy way that was meant to shut her up.

Lena scowled as she pulled away. He was wearing blue sweatpants and a bright orange Auburn sweatshirt. His bandages were off. His hair stuck up like a duck's ass in the back. The scalp had Frankenstein stitches that had already been documented on several Facebook pages.

She asked, "How did you get here? You're not supposed to be driving."

"Estefan picked me up to come see the new Harleys."

"Estefan," she muttered. The two had half a brain between them. "You need to go home."

"So, take me home." He wrapped his arms around her waist.

"Jared."

"Take me home." He grabbed her ass to get her going. Lena slapped away his hand. Cameras covered almost every angle of the building. She imagined the front desk sergeant was pressing record at this very moment.

She said, "You should be at home asleep right now. You were in the hospital. You almost died."

"I'm not sleepy."

"Bullshit. You can barely keep your eyes open."

"I wish you couldn't keep your mouth open."

She gave him a sharp look, but she took the hint. Lena had spent enough time with Nell to know the kind of wife she didn't want to be. She was all for putting a man in his place, but Jared's father was so neutered he probably sat down on the toilet to pee.

Jared leaned on her as they made their way toward the front exit. "These bikes are gonna ride awesome, babe. There's push buttons on the bags, they've all got the 103 power pack ..."

Lena tuned him out. She let Will's revelation roll through her mind. Cayla Martin. Dr. Benedict's office. No matter how hard Lena tried, she still couldn't recall meeting the woman. She was just one of those faceless people who blended into the scenery.

Jared didn't remember her, either. At least he hadn't commented the one time he'd watched the news with Lena. Cayla Martin's face had come on-screen and he'd turned off the TV before the story could run.

Unlike Lena, Jared didn't seem interested in finding out why they'd been targeted. He was too focused on being happy that the shooters hadn't succeeded. More likely, he thought it was Lena's fault but didn't want her to feel bad about it.

Lena had no problem letting him live in blissful ignorance. Since Fred Zachary had made a plea deal, there would be no trial. There would be no testimony explaining why two men had been sent to kill Lena and Jared. There was no reason for Jared to ever find out that he'd been at the root of all this evil. As forgiving as he was of others, he did not easily forgive himself. Lena was much more accustomed to living with guilt.

Not that she'd ever felt guilty for lying to her husband.

They finally reached the front lobby. Jared stopped walking. He put his hand to the wall to help keep his balance. They both knew they were in a camera blind spot. Every cop in the building knew how to stay off film.

Instead of doing something lewd, he told Lena, "You smell a little sweaty."

"Thanks a lot." She punched him in the shoulder.

He smiled sweetly. "Have your eyes always been brown?"

"Have you always been an idiot?"

He stopped smiling. The creases at the corners of his eyes didn't completely go away. "I want to try again."

Lena felt her face flush. He didn't have to tell her what he wanted to try again. "Do you think that's a good idea?"

"Hell no." He laughed. "That didn't stop us the first time."

Lena couldn't respond. She wasn't sure how she felt, whether or not she was ready. Last time had been an accident. To do it on purpose seemed like tempting fate.

"Lee." Jared took her hand. He'd been doing that a lot lately. Lena kept waiting to feel annoyed, but mostly, she found herself appreciating the solid feel of his hand, the tight grasp that told her he was going to be all right.

He said, "I want a baby with you. I want to make a life together. A family."

Just hearing the words made her want all of it, but Lena was too afraid to answer, too terrified to get her hopes up again.

Which is why she said, "Okay."

Jared grinned like a fool. "Really?"

"Yes." She said it again just to make sure. "Yes."

He kissed her, his mouth lingering longer than usual. His hand cradled her face. Jared looked into her eyes. His thumb traced where his lips had been. "And I want to rip out the kitchen because my dad did it wrong."

Lena's string of profanities was muffled by a trumpet of motorcycles pulling into the parking lot. She could see them lining up through the glass doors. Six Harley-Davidson police-issue bikes gleamed in the sunshine, courtesy of Sid Waller's stash of money in the basement of the shooting gallery.

“Hot damn!” Jared sounded like a frat boy at a pool party. He hobbled toward the parking lot, grabbing the back of a chair, the door handle, anything he could use to propel himself toward the bikes.

Lena shook her head as she took a key out of her pocket. Weapons weren’t allowed in areas where prisoners were kept, so there was a row of lockers by the front door. She slid her key into the correct lock. Lena had never been the type of woman to carry a purse. She had shoved her messenger bag into the tiny locker so many times that the canvas was worn where the metal edges scraped into the material. Out of habit, she did a quick inventory of the bag, making sure her Glock was inside, her wallet, her keys, her pens.

Almost as an afterthought, she checked the outside pocket for the postcard. There it was—stamped and ready to go. Lena had been carrying the postcard around with her for three days, putting it in her bag, sticking it in her pocket, tossing it onto the dresser. Now, she pulled out the card and looked at the photograph of downtown Macon. “Thank you for visiting the Heart of Georgia” was written across the top in a curly yellow script.

Lena flipped the card over. The address was the same one she’d written years ago on an envelope she’d mailed to Atlanta.

The letter.

Lena knew that she’d always placed too much value on Sara Linton’s opinion. For years, Lena had let the blame for Jeffrey’s death shadow her every move. She was so low at one point that she had to reach up to touch bottom. Lena had written the letter to beg for Sara’s forgiveness, to seek absolution. She’d structured her case the same way she would present an investigation in court. She’d testified to her own good character. She’d laid out the evidence. She’d highlighted the inconsistencies. She’d expertly spun the divergent facts in her favor. Lena hadn’t been writing an apology. She had been begging for the return of her very soul.

The postcard was different. Two words, not three pages. Giving something, not asking for it.

The truth was that Lena had recovered her soul on her own. When she looked at her life now, all she could see was good. She was good at her job. She was good to her friends. She had married a good man, even if he talked too much. They would eventually have a child together. Maybe more than one child. They would raise their family. They would suffer through Nell's visits. They would have birthday parties, Christmases, and Thanksgivings, and no matter what Sara Linton thought about Lena's choices, she would always know that she had done the right thing.

Virtue was its own absolution.

There was a mail slot by the lockers, a brass plaque with the words U.S. MAIL engraved in bold print across the top. Every day around lunchtime, the woman in the front office collected the outgoing mail and took it to the post office. One of the perks of working at a police station. Especially if you liked long lunches.

Lena stared down at the postcard. For just a moment, she thought about tearing it up. She couldn't bring herself to do it. Lena was fine. Sara was the one who needed forgiveness. She was the one who couldn't let go. It cost nothing to release her.

Lena angled the postcard into the mail slot. She held on for just a second, then let it drop into the basket below.

Outside, a motorcycle revved. Jared was straddling the bike. Estefan was behind him because he couldn't hold it up on his own.

Lena hefted her bag over her shoulder as she headed toward the door.

Toward Jared.

Toward her life.

She smiled at the thought of Sara reading the postcard. The message was simple. Lena could've just as easily written it to herself—

You win.

For Angela, Diane, and Victoria—my champions

Acknowledgments

I feel very lucky to have some really great folks on my team, among them Angela Cheng Caplan, Diane Dickensheid, and Victoria Sanders. Thank y'all so much for being the glue that helps hold this thing together.

As always, much praise goes to my editors, Kate Elton and Jennifer Hershey, for their insight and generosity.

Yet again, Dr. David Harper was very helpful with the medical details. He's kept Sara from killing lots of people over the years, and I appreciate his continued guidance. I owe eternal gratitude to the fine agents at the Georgia Bureau of Investigation for answering what I am sure seem like crazy questions. I promise I am only asking how to commit crimes in service to story. Chip Pendleton, MD, is a great doctor and even more generous adviser on all things Grady. I thank you, sir, for your ribald sense of humor and—more important—your time.

To Beth Tindall at Cincinnati Media, aka Webmaster Beth, aka my good friend: thanks for sticking with me all these years, and for not letting me use too much flash.

To all my publishers around the world and the good people who work on my books: I so appreciate your support. To my readers: I continue to be grateful for your kindness and all the cat photos you post on Facebook.

To my daddy: thanks for always being there even when I was young and stupid.

To D.A.: thanks for promising to be there when I am old and wise. I am sorry that only one of those things is happening.

ALSO BY KARIN SLAUGHTER

Blindsighted
Kisscut
A Faint Cold Fear
Indelible
Like a Charm (Editor)
Faithless
Triptych
Beyond Reach
Fractured Undone
Broken Fallen
Criminal

eBook original

Snatched
Thorn in My Side
Busted

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

KARIN SLAUGHTER is the New York Times and #1 internationally bestselling author of Criminal, “Snatched” and “Thorn in My Side” (e-book original novellas), Fallen, Broken, Undone, Fractured, Beyond Reach, Triptych, Faithless, Indelible, A Faint Cold Fear, Kisscut, and Blindsighted; she contributed to and edited Like a Charm. To date, her books have been translated into more than thirty languages. She is a native of Atlanta, Georgia, where she currently lives and is working on her next novel.

www.karinslaughter.com

If you enjoyed Unseen, you won't want to miss the next riveting thriller
by New York Times bestselling author

KARIN SLAUGHTER

COP TOWN

Coming in hardcover and eBook from Delacorte Press
in Summer 2014.

Read on for a preview ...

1.

Maggie Lawson was upstairs in her bedroom when she heard the phone ringing in the kitchen. She checked her watch. There was nothing good about a phone ringing this early in the morning. Sounds from the kitchen echoed up the back stairs: The click of the receiver being lifted from the cradle. The low murmur of her mother's voice answering. The slap of the phone cord dragging the floor as she walked back and forth across the kitchen.

The linoleum had been worn away in staggered gray lines from the countless times Delia Lawson had paced the kitchen listening to bad news.

The conversation didn't last long. Delia hung up the phone. The loud click echoed up to the rafters. Maggie knew every sound the house made. She had spent a lifetime studying its moods. Even from her room, she could follow her mother's movements through the kitchen: The refrigerator door opening and closing. A cabinet banging shut. Eggs being cracked into a bowl. Thumb flicking her Bic to light a cigarette.

Maggie knew how this would go. Delia had been playing bad news blackjack for as long as Maggie could remember. She would hold for a while, but then tonight, tomorrow or maybe even a week from now, Delia would pick a fight with Maggie and the minute Maggie opened her mouth to respond, her mother would lay down her cards: the electric bill was past due, her shifts at the diner had been cut, the car needed a new transmission, and here Maggie was making things worse by talking back and for the love of God, couldn't she give her mother a break?

Busted. Dealer wins.

The ironing board screeched as Maggie closed it. She stepped carefully around folded stacks of laundry. She'd been up since five that morning ironing clothes for the family. She was Sisyphus in a bathrobe. They all had uniforms of one kind or another. Lilly wore green-and-blue-checkered skirts and yellow button-down tops to school. Jimmy and Maggie had their dark blue pants and long-sleeved shirts from the Atlanta Police Department. Delia had her green polyester smocks from the diner. And then they all came home and changed into regular clothes, which meant that every day, Maggie was washing and ironing for eight people instead of four.

There was a scratching sound from Lilly's room as she dropped the needle on a record. Maggie clenched her teeth. Tapestry. Lilly played the album incessantly. It was part of her plan to drive them all insane.

Maggie waited for Jimmy to bang on the wall for silence, but then she remembered her brother had picked up a night shift. She looked out the window. His car wasn't in the driveway. He was spared the listening choices of an impossibly moody thirteen-year-old.

Now seemed like as good a time as any to go down for breakfast. Maggie pulled the foam rollers from her hair as she walked down the stairs. The kitchen was humid as the middle of summer. No matter the time of day, it always smelled of fried bacon and cigarette smoke.

The source of both stood at the sink. Delia's back was bent as she filled the percolator. When Maggie thought of her mother, she thought of this kitchen—the faded avocado green appliances, the cracked yellow linoleum on the floor, the burned, black ridges on the laminate countertop where her father rested his cigarettes.

As usual, Delia had been up since before Maggie. No one knew what Delia did in the morning hours. Probably curse God that she'd woken up in the same house with the same problems. It was an unwritten rule that you didn't go downstairs until you heard eggs being whisked in a bowl. Delia always cooked a big breakfast, a holdover from her Depression childhood, when breakfast might be the only meal of the day.

"Lilly up?" Delia hadn't turned around, but she knew Maggie was there.

"Yeah." Maggie made the same offer she did every morning. "Can I do anything?"

She nodded toward the television on the counter. The picture was rolling. "See if you can get the signal straight."

Maggie turned the antennae, squeezed the aluminum foil around the tips.

"Bang it," Delia ordered, because Maggie had never fixed a TV before in her life. "Not too hard."

Maggie slapped the side of the set, feeling the warm plastic under her palm.

"I said not—"

"There." Something had jiggled the tubes the right way. The gray lines zigzagged. They saw the new black anchor on the morning news, then the weatherman, then the screen went wonky again.

"For God's sake. Is it too much to ask?" Delia slapped bacon into the frying pan. "Watching the news in the morning is the only thing I have to look forward to."

"Thanks, Mom." Maggie changed the channel, then tried the next one. All three were fuzzy. "Maybe if I—"

"Just turn the damn thing off." Delia jabbed the bacon with a fork. "What does it matter?"

Maggie switched off the set. She leaned against the counter with her arms crossed low on her waist. Delia looked exhausted. They'd all been picking up extra shifts to pay Lilly's private school tuition. None of them wanted to see her bused across town to a ghetto school. They had four more years of tuition and textbooks and uniforms before Lilly graduated. Maggie didn't know how much longer her mother could take it. She'd been knocked to the mat so many times that no one could blame her for not getting up.

As a child, Delia had seen her father shoot himself in the head after losing the family business. Her mother had worked herself into an early grave on a sharecropper's farm. She'd lost her two brothers to polio. She must've thought she'd hit pay dirt when she married Hank Lawson. He wore a suit and had a good job and a nice car, and then he'd come home from Okinawa so shell-shocked that he'd been in and out of the state mental hospital ever since.

There wasn't much that Maggie knew about her father, though he'd obviously tried to build a life between hospital stays. When Lilly was born, he put up the swing set in the backyard. One time, he found some gray paint on sale at the hardware store and worked thirty-six hours straight painting every room in the house the color of an aircraft carrier. On weekends, he mowed the lawn for as long as it took to drink a six-pack of Schlitz, then left the mower wherever he ran out. One time when it snowed and Maggie was sick with strep, he brought her some snow in a Tupperware bowl so she could play with it in the bathroom.

“Maggie, for the love of God.” Delia tapped the fork against the frying pan. “Can’t you find something to do?”

Maggie grabbed a stack of plates and silverware off the counter and took them into the dining room. Lilly was already at the table. Her head was bent over a textbook, which Maggie took as a miracle. The last year hadn’t been so much a burgeoning of Lilly’s womanhood as a running audition for the Exorcist.

Still, Maggie couldn’t give up on her baby sister. “You have a good night?”

“Peachy.” Lilly cupped her fingers across her forehead like she was saluting the page.

Maggie put a plate by Lilly’s elbow. She bumped her with her thigh. “What’re you studying?” She bumped her again. Then again. When Lilly didn’t respond, she sang the opening lines from I Feel the Earth Move, punctuating each bump.

“Stop it.” Lilly tilted her head down even more. Her nose was practically touching the book.

Maggie leaned over to set the other side of the table. She glanced back at Lilly, who had been staring at the same spot on the page since Maggie walked in.

Maggie said, “Look at me.”

“I’m studying.”

“Look at me.”

“I have a test.”

“Look at me before I make you.”

Lilly looked up. Her eyes were lined like Cleopatra’s.

Maggie kept her voice low. “I told you to stop stealing stuff from my room.”

Lilly blinked innocently. “What did I steal?”

“My eyeliner, you little brat.” Maggie tugged her hair harder than she meant to.

Lilly screamed like she’d been beaten.

The kitchen door swung open. Delia’s hands and arms were lined with platters of pancakes, eggs, bacon and biscuits. “You’ve got two seconds to wash that shit off your face before I get your father's belt." Lilly bolted from the room. Delia banged the platters down on the table one by one. "See what you're teaching her?"

"Why am I—"

"Don't talk back." Delia dug a pack of cigarettes out of her apron. "You're twenty-two years old, Margaret. Why do I feel like I have two teenagers under my roof?"

"Twenty-three" was all Maggie could say.

Delia lit the cigarette and hissed out smoke between her teeth. "Twenty-three," she repeated. "I was married with two kids when I was your age."

Maggie resisted the urge to ask her mother how that had turned out.

Delia picked a speck of tobacco off her tongue. "This women's lib stuff works for rich girls, but all you've got going for you is your face and your figure. You need to take advantage of both before you lose them."

Maggie smoothed her lips together. She imagined a lost-and-found box in the back of a storeroom with all the missing faces and figures of thirty-year-old women.

"Are you listening to me?"

"Mama." Maggie kept her tone even. "I like my job."

"Must be nice to do whatever you like." Delia pressed the cigarette to her mouth. She took a deep breath and held the smoke in her lungs. She looked up at the ceiling, shook her head like she was having a conversation with herself.

Maggie guessed it was coming sooner than she'd thought. Her mother was shuffling the deck before laying down the Bad News Card: Why are you throwing away your life? Go to nursing school. Be a Kelly Girl. Get some kind of job where you'll meet a man who doesn't think you're a whore.

Instead, Delia told her, "Don Wesley was killed this morning."

Maggie's hand went to her chest. Her heart was a hummingbird trapped beneath her fingers.

Delia said, "Shot in the head. Died two seconds after he got to the hospital."

"Is Jimmy—"

"If Jimmy was hurt, do you think I'd be standing here talking about Don Wesley?"

Maggie took a mouthful of air, then coughed it back out. The room was filled with smoke and cooking odors. She wanted to open a window but her father had painted them all shut.

"How did it ...?" Maggie had trouble forming the question. "How did it happen?"

"I'm just the mother. You think they tell me anything?" She tapped ash into her cupped hand. "Jimmy's safe. That's all that matters. And you be nice to him when he gets here."

"Of course I—"

A car door slammed in the driveway. The window-panes shook from the sound. Delia's mouth tightened to a thin line. Maggie held her breath because it was easier than breathing. She marked the visitor's progress: Shoes scuffed across the carport, up the back stairs. The kitchen door opened, but didn't close.

She knew it was her uncle Terry before she saw him. He never shut the back door. The kitchen was a non-room to him, one of those things women needed that men didn't want to know about, like sanitary napkins and douches.

Though the sun was barely up, Terry Lawson reeked of alcohol. Maggie could smell it from across the room. He swayed as he stood in the doorway to the dining room. He was wearing his police captain's uniform, but the shirt was unbuttoned, showing his white undershirt. Tufts of hair stuck up from the collar. He looked like he'd slept in his car with a bottle of Southern Comfort trapped between his knees. Which was probably where he was when he heard about Don Wesley on his radio.

Delia said, "Sit down. You look dead on your feet."

Terry rubbed his jaw as he looked at his niece and sister-in-law. "Jimmy's on his way."

"Is he all right?" Maggie asked.

"Of course he's all right. Don't get hysterical."

The fact that he told her not to get hysterical made Maggie feel like she was going to get hysterical. "You should've called me."

"For what?"

Maggie was stunned. She was a cop, too. You went to the hospital when another cop was there. You gave blood. You waited for news. You comforted the family. It was part of the job. "I should've been there."

"For what?" he repeated. "The nurses fetched us coffee. All you'd do is get in the way." He nodded at Delia. "I could use some, by the way.”

She walked back into the kitchen to get his coffee.

Maggie sat down. She was still reeling from the news. She hated that Terry was the only way she was going to get answers. “How did it happen?”

“Same way it always happens.” Terry dropped into the chair at the head of the table. “Some nigger shot him.”

“Was it the Shooter?”

“Shooter.” He grunted. “Stop talking out of your ass.”

“Uncle Terry!” Lilly ran into the room. She threw her arms around him and kissed his cheek. She always acted a few years younger around Terry. It drove Maggie crazy because Terry was the last person on earth Lilly should be giving her love to.

Maggie told her, “Jimmy’s fine, but Don Wesley got shot last night. He’s dead.”

Terry gave her a sharp look. He patted Lilly’s arms, which were still looped around his neck. “It’s okay, sweetie. We’ll get the bastard.”

Lilly looked at Maggie for confirmation. Her eyes were red from where she’d scrubbed off the make-up. She was still so young and vulnerable. Maggie felt like a heel for being so blunt about Don.

“Come on.” Terry patted Lilly’s arms again so she’d loosen her hold. “We’ll have him strung up by the end of the day. Don’t you worry.”

“Nobody’s worried.” Delia came back with Terry’s coffee. She put the mug on the table and handed him the newspaper.

Maggie saw the headline under the Atlanta Journal masthead. It was the first time since the election that the paper had led with something other than the newly elected black mayor.

ANOTHER COP MURDERED

Maggie said, “That makes five this year.”

“Maggie.” Delia headed toward the kitchen again. “Don’t bother your uncle.”

She pretended not to hear the warning. “It’s the Shooter.”

Terry shook his head.

“It was the middle of the morning. They were obviously ambushed. It has to be—”

"Eat your breakfast," he said. "You want a ride to work, you need to be ready to go when I am."

Lilly still had one arm draped around Terry's shoulders. Her voice sounded impossibly small when she asked, "Is everybody gonna be all right, Uncle Terry?"

"This is still a cop town, sweetheart. The monkeys ain't runnin' the zoo." He patted her bottom. "Come on. Eat."

Lilly never argued with Terry. She sat down and started to eat.

He asked her, "You doing good in school?"

"Yes, sir. I got an A in biology and a B in—"

"Good girl," Terry said, because he wasn't really listening. He'd already opened the newspaper. Maggie could only see the top of his head, the square crewcut that showcased his receding hairline. He needed glasses. His forehead wrinkled as he squinted at the football scores.

Maggie's gaze went back to the headline on the front page. She couldn't read the story from here, but she knew what it would say. In the last two months, four patrol officers had been shot in cold blood in the early morning hours. They had all been in pairs. Nobody patrolled downtown alone. The first two were found in an alley—they'd been forced down on their knees and executed from behind. The other two were found behind the service entrance to the Portman Motel. Same modus operandi. Same lack of leads. No witnesses. No bullet casings. No fingerprints. No suspects.

Around the station, they'd started calling their mystery bad guy the Atlanta Shooter.

"I put on a fresh pot." Delia sat down at the table, something she rarely did for long. She was turned in her chair, facing Terry—another thing she rarely did. "Tell me what really happened, Terrance."

Terrance. The word hung in the air alongside the smoke and bacon grease.

Terry made a show of his reluctance. He sighed. He took his time folding the newspaper. He put it down on the table and lined it up to the edge. Instead of answering Delia's question, he made a gun with his hand and put it to the side of his face. Nobody said anything until he pulled the trigger.

Lilly whispered, "Jesus."

For once, nobody corrected her language.

Terry said, "Nothing Jimmy could do. He ran twenty blocks with Don slung over his shoulder. Got to the hospital, but it was too late."

Maggie thought about her brother running all that way on his bad knee. "Jimmy wasn't—"

"Jimmy's fine." Terry's voice sounded like he was humoring them. "What he doesn't need is a bunch of hens squawking around."

With that, he opened his newspaper and buried his nose back in the pages.

He hadn't really answered Delia's question. He'd just given the highlights, likely the same details you could read in the paper. They all knew that, even Lilly. And they all knew there was no use pointing it out. Terry couldn't be pushed.

Instead of going back into the kitchen, Delia took a packet of Kools from her apron pocket and shook one out. Her hand trembled as she fumbled with her lighter. She looked calmer once she had it lit. Smoke furred from her nose, her mouth. Every wrinkle on Delia Lawson's face came from sucking on cigarettes—the crepe-like lines around her lips, the sagging jawline, the deep indentation between her eyebrows. Even her dark hair was streaked with the same smoke gray that came out of her Kools. She was forty-five years old, but on a good day, she looked around one hundred. Right now, she looked twice that, like she was already in her grave.

Like Don Wesley would soon be.

Maggie had attended at least two dozen cop funerals in her career. Atlanta's ghettos were filled with people who had quick tempers and access to cheap guns. Most of the funerals were for cops like Don Wesley, murdered in the line of duty. Some had died under less honorable circumstances—trying to take money off the wrong bookie, sleeping with the wrong man's wife. They were still cops and they were still dead, so everybody turned out like they were supposed to.

The first funeral she'd attended was the worst. Maggie had sobbed openly as she watched the procession of motormen and cruisers escorting the hearse down Peachtree. It was a solemn affair. Her heart swelled with emotion, absorbing the weighty responsibility of the badge. By the tenth funeral, which honored a detective who'd been shot by a pimp for refusing to pay for services, all Maggie could think about was how hot it was in her dress uniform, and what a relief it would be to go home and sit in front of the fan.

Delia always said you could get used to anything. Maggie had gotten used to cop funerals. And then the Atlanta Shooter had come along. Four men, just out doing their jobs. Four men who'd felt the grit of the asphalt under their knees, the cold, hard metal of a gun pressed to the back of their heads.

Those funerals were different. She'd felt it in the crowd—the anger, the confusion, the sting of injustice. Hot tears slid down her cheeks at those funerals, even though she'd never met the dead men. She had cried about the idea of them. They were just doing their jobs. They weren't stealing or gambling or screwing around. The only reason they'd died was because they were cops.

Like Jimmy. Like Terry. Like Don Wesley.

He was a Marine just back from Vietnam, unable to do any job that didn't require him to carry a gun. His people were from lower Alabama. He rented an apartment off Piedmont Avenue. He drove a burgundy colored Chevelle. He had a girlfriend—a doe-eyed hippie who talked about "the man" and didn't complain when Don hit her because he'd seen so much bad shit in the jungle.

And none of that mattered anymore because he was dead.

Terry banged his mug down on the table. Coffee splashed onto the white tablecloth. "Any of this for me?"

Delia stood up. She took his plate and started loading it with food, though Terry was usually too hung over to eat anything in the morning.

She put the plate in front of him. Her tone had a begging quality when she said, "Terry, please. Just tell me what happened, all right? He's my boy. I need to know."

Terry looked at Maggie, then looked down at his half-empty mug.

She allowed herself the luxury of an audible sigh before she went to get the percolator from the stove. As soon as she left the room, Terry started talking.

"They were out on a signal forty-four off the spike at Five Points. That's a possible robbery." He leaned back in his chair and caught Maggie's eye, like she hadn't been behind the wheel of a squad car for five years. "They get there, check the place out.

Doors are locked front and back. They give an all-clear on the radio. And then ...” He shrugged. “Guy comes around the corner, shoots Don in the head, then hightails it. You know the rest. Jimmy did everything he could. It just wasn’t enough.”

“Poor Jimmy,” Lilly mumbled.

“Poor nobody,” Terry countered. “Jimmy Lawson can take care of himself. Got it?”

And for an extra thrill, read on for the short story

SNATCHED

For Gina

Special Agent Will Trent sat in the last stall of the men's bathroom between gates C-38 and C-40 at Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport. He stared at the closed stall door as he tried not to listen to a man availing himself of the urinal. Muzak played from the overhead speakers. Lady Antebellum's "Need You Now." At first, the song had reminded Will of his sort-of-new girlfriend, Sara Linton. And then it had played over and over again, at least sixteen times in the last five hours, and all Will could think about was jamming his fingers into a wall socket and electrocuting himself so he never had to hear it again.

There were many jobs with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation that agents considered less than ideal—running background screenings for convenience store owners who wanted to sell lottery tickets, going undercover in bingo parlors to make sure old ladies weren't being ripped off—but no assignment was considered more odious than having to police the men's toilets at the busiest passenger airport in the world.

Sites all over the Internet listed the best bathrooms for male travelers seeking anonymous hook-ups. Hartsfield was always a prime location. Posters gave the best times for cruising, the type of guy to expect in which concourse, and the various under-stall contortions that were preferred at each location.

Will didn't mind what two consenting adults got up to. He just wished they wouldn't do it in public where kids could walk in. He usually spent the first half hour of every morning checking the cruising sites and anonymously posting that he'd seen a police officer staking out the stalls.

And still these idiots kept showing up.

Eighty-nine million passengers a year. Five runways. Seven concourses. Over a hundred restaurants. Twice as many shops. A people mover. A train station. Close to six million square feet of space that sprawled across two counties, three cities, and five jurisdictions. Seven hundred and twenty-five commodes. Three hundred and thirty-eight urinals.

This last bit of trivia was particularly galling, as Will was probably going to lay eyes on each and every urinal in the airport before he died.

All because he wouldn't get a haircut.

The GBI manual called for agents to keep their hair at least half an inch off their collar. Amanda Wagner, his boss, had slapped a ruler to his neck a few days ago. Will was right on the line, but Amanda had never been one to let fact get in the way of her firm opinion. When Will hadn't rushed to the barber, she'd assigned him to toilet duty until further notice. Amanda was going to have to wait a good long while. Sara liked Will's hair long. She liked to stroke her fingers through it. She liked to drag her nails along his scalp.

Which meant Will was pretty much going to be the Samson of Hartsfield until the day he died.

A man walked into the bathroom. He said, "What I told her was, 'You don't like it, you can move out.' "

Will leaned his head back against the wall and closed his eyes. Over the course of the last few days, he'd learned that a surprising number of people talked on their cell phones while they used the bathroom. One of the janitors had told Will that seven million people a year accidentally dropped their phones in the toilet. Will prayed this jackass would be one of them.

No such luck.

The urinal flushed. The man left without washing his hands. This was no longer shocking, either. In fact, Will had witnessed worse lapses in personal hygiene over the last two weeks than he had during his entire adult life.

Will pulled out his cell phone to check the time. The numbers glimmered, then the screen went blank. A marathon session of Minesweeper had drained the battery into the red zone. He would have to charge it during lunch, which was blissfully close enough to justify abandoning his post. The business travel rush had come and gone. Another morning without an arrest. Will hoped his good luck would flow into the afternoon. He was probably the only cop on the planet right now who was happy to post a zero in the win column.

Will stood up. His knees popped. He stretched his arms up to the ceiling in order to coax his spine into a position more conducive to walking. A spasm nearly doubled him over. He wasn't built for sitting all day. He'd rather chase a chicken back and forth across a courtyard than do this. At the very least, it would give him some exercise.

Around ten every morning, Will usually had his second breakfast of a fried chicken biscuit. By noon, he was at Nathan's ordering a slawdog meal. At two, he visited the pretzel stand, and at four-thirty, he grabbed an ice cream sandwich or a Cinnabon on his way to the parking garage.

If he didn't die of boredom, he always had a heart attack to look forward to.

The stall door next to him opened. Reluctantly, Will sat back down on the toilet and waited. Lady Antebellum revved up over the speakers. Will suppressed a scream. He'd thought he had another thirteen minutes before the track cycled on again. The song pierced his eardrums like an ice pick.

And then a child whispered, "Please, I wanna go home."

Will turned his head, though he could only see the wall next to him. There was something plaintive in the little girl's voice that cut straight through. Will leaned down. He saw a pair of white Hello Kitty ballet shoes with pink trim. Impossibly tiny ankles in white tights. The man behind her wore gray Brooks running shoes. The hem of his tan cargo pants was high, showing white socks.

"Just go," the man ordered. "Quickly."

Slowly, the little feet turned. The bigger feet did not.

Will sat up. He stared at the stall door in front of him. Phone numbers of escorts, tips on the best strip clubs. He knew them all by heart.

The man said, "Hurry up." He said something else, but his voice was too low for Will to make out the words.

Regardless, the little girl sniffed, which made Will wonder if she was crying. He also wondered why every hair on the back of his neck was standing at attention. Will had been with the GBI for fifteen years and learned early on that there was such a thing as a cop's intuition.

Something wasn't right here. He felt it in his gut.

Will stood from the toilet. He'd taped a Band-Aid over the automatic sensor to keep the toilet from flushing. He peeled back the strip and let the sound of a flush announce his presence.

There was a subtle change in the air, as if the man was suddenly on alert.

Will unlocked the stall door. His badge was looped on his belt. He slipped it into his pocket, not wanting to spook the guy. His Glock and holster had been checked with security, but his handcuffs were neatly stacked into the leather pouch at the small of his back.

Which hardly mattered. You couldn't arrest a man for snapping at his daughter. Half the population would be in jail right now.

But still—Will sensed that something was wrong.

He went to the sink and held his hands under the faucet so the water would flow. Will waited, staring at the reflection of the closed stall. He could still see the man's heels under the door. The running shoes looked new. The hem was torn at the back of the trousers. The man had used a stapler to tack them up.

Seconds passed. A full minute. Finally, the little feet went back to the floor.

The toilet flushed. Will waited. And waited. Eventually, the lock slid back. The stall door opened. Will glanced at the man, taking in the short brown hair, the thick black glasses, before returning his gaze to his hands under the faucet. The guy was wearing a green jacket that looked a few sizes too big. He was tall, almost matching Will's height of six-three, but probably weighing in at twenty pounds heavier, mostly in the gut. He looked to be around fifty. There was no telling how young the girl was; maybe six or seven. She was in a flowered dress. The pink collar matched her shoes.

Will tried a casual, "How's it going?"

The man didn't respond. A nervous look twisted his features before he turned toward the exit, dragging the little girl behind him.

Will's peripheral vision tracked the man leaving the bathroom. At the last minute, the man jerked the girl by the arm and practically flung her into the concourse.

Definitely not right.

Will waited a few seconds before following them. He peered around the corner of the exit and saw the man glancing nervously over his shoulder. Was he looking for his wife? Was he just irritated? Was something else going on?

The concourse was filled with the usual travelers dragging suitcases and pillows along the tile floor. Will weaved in and out of them, hunching down because his height made him stick out among most of the crowd. He saw the man heading toward the escalator that led down to the interterminal train. Will pulled out his cell phone as he followed. He tried to scroll to Faith Mitchell's number, but the phone didn't respond.

Minesweeper.

Will cursed as he stuck the phone back into his pocket.

What would he tell his partner, anyway? That a man was being curt with his child in the bathroom? That the man didn't look like the type to make sure the pink trim on his daughter's collar exactly matched the pink on her Hello Kitty shoes?

If she was his daughter.

Will could see the top of the girl's head. Her hair was light, almost yellow. The man's hair was an unnatural brown, possibly dyed. Did that mean he wasn't the father? Will hadn't grown up with brothers and sisters, but he knew that the color of your hair could darken as you grew older. Will knew from the few photos he had of himself as a kid that his sandy-brown hair had started out nearly white.

Besides, the man could be her stepfather.

Whoever he was, he didn't take much care with the girl. At the bottom of the escalator, he wrenched her up by the arm, pulling her off the last two stairs, jerking her toward the train that led to the other concourses.

"Hey!" a woman shouted in protest, but the man was already heading toward the first car on the train. There were two sets of doors. He used the far set, standing close to the exit, which meant he'd be one of the first people off.

Will could hear the familiar announcement warning that the train was about to depart. He pushed past the couple in front of him, hoping he looked like a normal, hurried traveler as he bolted toward the first car. Will used the second set of doors. A quick jump at the last minute got him inside before the final announcement came.

The crowd shifted as the train pulled away from the C concourse. The car was full. Will looked up at the display that showed the train's progress. There were three more stops before baggage claim and the exit.

Will tried to be unobtrusive as he searched for the man and the girl. A group of Delta pilots and flight attendants were clustered in the center of the car. Couples and single business travelers were packed tightly around them. Most of the occupants were looking down at their iPhones and BlackBerries. Will found the man at the front of the car. He was still standing directly in front of the doors.

The brown hair made sense now. It was a wig. The thick black glasses were probably fake, too. The man slid them up his nose as he stared at his watch. And then he looked down at his side. Will guessed he was looking at the girl. There was nothing like compassion on his face. Just anger, tinged with what looked like anxiety.

Will knelt down, pretending to tie his shoe. He peered past a woman's leg and saw the girl. Blonde hair like straw. Pale cheeks. Deep blue eyes with tears streaming down.

She looked straight at Will, and he felt like a knife was stabbing into his chest. She was obviously terrified.

Or was she just scared because she was in a busy airport, surrounded by strangers? Was she going to a funeral? Was she visiting a sick relative?

Will stood. He'd been stuck on toilet duty for three days. Maybe he was creating a circumstance where none existed. Maybe being a cop had made him too suspicious.

Or maybe he was right.

Will turned his back to the man and child. The pilot beside him was checking her email.

"Hey," Will said, keeping his voice low. Her look said she thought he was going to try to hit on her, but Will pulled out his badge, keeping it shielded in his hand so that the whole train wouldn't see. "I need your phone."

She handed it to him without question. Will knelt down again, pretending to tie his shoe. He waited for the crowd to shift, then took a picture of the little girl. He stood to capture the man's image, but the train jerked to a stop. The doors opened. The Delta crew got off. There were only a handful of people between Will and the man now.

"You coming?" one of the flight attendants asked.

The pilot waved him off, saying, "Be right there. I forgot my flight plan."

The flight attendant didn't seem to buy the explanation, but the people crowding in on the train cut him off. The announcement came again, a tinny woman's voice warning them that the train was about to depart. Will glanced up at the display. They were two more stops away from the main terminal. Will dialed a familiar phone number and sent the picture of the little girl to Faith Mitchell, his partner. He handed the phone back to the pilot. "Thank you."

She responded with a nod, taking the phone. He saw her scan the car with thinly disguised curiosity. Most of the Delta pilots had trained in the Air Force. They were as proficient at combat as they were at landing a 747. The woman looked ready to back him up, though Will was hard-pressed to think of a legal justification for detaining the man.

The girl could be the man's daughter. Granddaughter. Stepchild. There didn't have to be a funeral or a sick relative. She could simply be tired and cranky from a long flight. For that matter, so could the man. Lots of people took their anger out on their kids. It was hardly a surprising occurrence.

The train slowed for the A concourse. Again, there was the usual flow in and out of passengers. The pilot gave Will an apologetic shrug before getting off the train. She glanced back at him before rolling her flight case toward the opposite train.

The doors closed. Will could feel someone staring at him. He counted off a few seconds, but he still felt scrutinized. After a few more seconds, he tried to casually look back. His eyes met the man's. There was a steeliness there now—no anxiety. No worry.

The train slowed again. The T concourse. Will stepped toward the doors and stared at his own reflection in the glass. His suit and tie made him look like every other passenger in the airport. Except for his lack of a suitcase. Will didn't even have a briefcase for cover.

He took out his cell phone and pretended to scroll through numbers. Faith was probably calling back the Delta pilot right now, wondering why the woman had sent her a photograph of a child. Will was seized by an overwhelming sense of futility. There was nothing about the man's actions that indicated anything was wrong. Lots of children cried for no reason. Lots of children wanted to go home, especially after a long flight.

The doors slid open. The crowd shifted to leave before the announcement reminded them that baggage claim was the next stop. Will got off the train. He kept his eyes on his phone as he walked. He heard the doors close, the train lurch forward. He could feel the man watching him, and looked up at the last minute. The man stood in the middle of the car, feet apart to counteract the movement. His hand was gripping the girl's arm. The corner of his mouth went up in a knowing smile.

And then he was gone.

Will bolted up the escalator, taking the metal stairs two at a time. As usual, most people either didn't know or didn't care that they were supposed to move to one side for those who weren't content to stand. Will absorbed his share of nasty comments as he pushed his way to the top of the concourse.

The airport didn't advertise the exit through the T concourse, probably because the top of the escalator was already packed with people coming out of security. Most of them had absolutely no idea where they were going. They stood at the display boards with their mouths hanging open, unable to remember their flight numbers, let alone figure out how to locate their gates.

Will had to move people aside as he broke through the milling crowd. He went to the desk just past security and showed his badge to the TSA agent. And then he couldn't think what to say.

The guy asked, "What is it, buddy?"

Will thought about the little girl, the fear in her voice when she said she wanted to go home. The way the man dragged her along like a rag doll. That triumphant smile on his face as the train pulled away.

Will said, "I need you to call Commander Livingston and tell her there's a possible child abduction."

The agent grabbed the receiver and started punching numbers. He told Will, "Takes fifteen minutes to shut this place down."

"Green jacket, tan pants, brown wig. The girl's six or seven, flowered dress, white Hello Kitty shoes—ballet slippers. Can I borrow your cell phone?"

The man handed him his cell as he spoke into the landline. "Code Adam. I need Livingston pronto."

Will didn't wait around. He headed toward the exit, feeling the eyes of hundreds of cameras following him. Commander Vanessa Livingston was in charge of the Atlanta Police Department's airport precinct. Her officers augmented the TSA, addressing the many thefts, assaults, and petty crimes that you could expect in a place that saw nearly a quarter of a million visitors every single day. The cops manning the cameras had probably already tracked Will through the airport, on the train. There would be footage of the man and child. They'd probably show it at Will's formal hearing, where he'd be fired for harassing an innocent father and his daughter.

Will dialed Faith's number into the TSA agent's cell phone. She picked up on the first ring.

"Mitchell."

"Did you get the picture?"

"Yes. What's going on?"

"I think—" Will stopped, but it was too late to equivocate. "I think the girl is being abducted." He mumbled an apology as he bumped into a traveler. "He had her in the bathroom. I don't know, Faith. Something's not right."

"I'm on it." Faith ended the call. Will tucked the cell phone into his pocket and quickened his pace.

A revolving door led to the South Terminal, which led to the parking decks, which led to the exit. Will didn't wait patiently in line, instead swinging through the door before anyone could stop him. The terminal was filled with noontime travelers. Ticketing lines lazily snaked inside velvet ropes. Red Coats stood by to keep the traffic flowing smoothly. Will jogged toward the large escalators that delivered exiting passengers up from the train. He stopped at the chauffeur waiting area. The folks behind a USO sign started waving and cheering as some soldiers reached the top of the escalator.

"Uh-oh," one of the chauffeurs said. "Trouble brewin'."

A cop on a Segway zoomed by. Two more came on foot, hands to their guns to keep them from hitting their hips as they trotted toward the escalators. Commander Livingston was probably on her way down, too. She'd started on the force with Will's boss a thousand years ago. They were still close friends. Amanda was probably already on her way to the airport from her downtown office. Faith would be putting out a Levi's Call, Georgia's version of an abducted-child alert. The entire airport was grinding to a halt.

Eighty-nine million passengers a year. Five runways. Seven concourses. Over a hundred restaurants. Twice as many shops. A people mover. A train station.

All shut down on a dime because Will had a hunch.

He felt a bead of sweat roll down the side of his face. Will found himself in the peculiar position of actually hoping a crime had been committed.

The USO crowd cheered again as more soldiers arrived. Will glanced into baggage claim, wondering if he'd missed the man and child. The exit through the T concourse was faster, but Will had stopped for God only knew how long at security. He checked the other side of the terminal, the lesser-used North Terminal. A few stragglers stood around gaping at their phones, probably not realizing that the chauffeurs were on the other side.

Will turned back around. He nearly tripped on a suitcase a woman was dragging behind her like a tail. Her head was down. She was reading her email, mindless of the fact that she was making everyone else dart out of her way. Which was a good thing, because Will would not have seen the man and child otherwise.

The green jacket was what finally caught Will's eye. The man was fifty yards away on the other side of the baggage claim area. Will saw the top of his head, the distinct bad wig and thick glasses, as the man rode the escalator down to the lower parking level.

A surge of people pushed against Will as he ran across baggage claim. A well-timed jump over a cart of suitcases was the only thing that kept him from falling flat on his face. That didn't stop people from yelling at him. One guy even grabbed Will by the arm, but he easily shook him off as he headed down the escalator and into the underground tunnel.

Up ahead, Will saw the man again. He was pulling the little girl. She looked as if she'd gone limp. Her feet dragged across the tile floor. She lost one of her shoes, but the man wouldn't let her stop to get it. The double glass doors slid open. The man looked down at his watch. He walked through the door, then looked down at his watch again before he disappeared from Will's view.

Will waved his arms in the air, hoping to catch the eye of whoever was watching the security cameras. He scooped up the girl's shoe as he jogged through the tunnel. Will slowed his pace outside the doors, keeping his distance as he followed the man into the underground breezeway.

As with the T concourse exit, the breezeway wasn't known by many travelers. It was a relatively private space, though it was about the length of a football field. A four-lane road separated the main airport from the bottom level of the parking garage. This time of day, the area was almost completely deserted.

Instead of crossing the road toward the garage, the man headed up the sidewalk, going in the same direction as traffic. Will put the little girl's shoe in his jacket pocket. The thing was so small that it fit in the palm of his hand.

Cars weren't allowed to stop underneath the airport, but many risked a ticket, idling in the breezeway in order to avoid having to pay steep parking charges. The exit was a straight shot ahead, and you could either merge onto the interstate or loop back around the airport. It was the perfect rendezvous point if you wanted to get out of here fast.

Will saw a gleaming red truck parked several feet ahead. A University of Georgia bumper sticker was on the fender, and an NRA decal was stuck to the back window of the cab. The driver was wearing a cowboy hat. Will saw the man spit into a red plastic cup as he walked by. The Cowboy nodded. Will nodded back.

And then, straight ahead, the little girl made a mewing noise as she stumbled. The man yanked her up violently. She struggled to keep up, walking on the tips of her toes. The man looked at his watch again. He glanced over his shoulder. Will tensed, but he was looking at traffic, not Will. The man studied a black Chevy Malibu that passed. Again, he looked at his watch, then back over his shoulder. Someone was supposed to pick him up; that much was obvious. Was he trading off the girl? Was he going to pick up another one and take her somewhere across the country?

The busiest passenger airport in the world. Over three thousand flights a day. Over two hundred gates. Over 130 destinations. Over a million ways to traffic children in and out of the city, if not the country.

Will looked behind him as a Prius hummed by. An Atlanta Police cruiser crawled up behind the red truck. Will motioned for the officer to stay back, but it was too late. The guy in the truck beeped his horn.

"I'm gettin'," the Cowboy called out. The truck's engine rumbled as he pulled away from the curb.

Will turned back around, searching for the girl and man, but they were gone.

"Shit," Will hissed. He scanned the breezeway, furiously searching for the green jacket, the bad wig.

The Prius. It had parked in front of the far exit. Will ran toward the car. He grabbed the door handle and yanked it open. The woman inside screamed, terrified. Her hands went to her face. Her foot slipped off the pedal. Will scanned the back seat. The cargo cover was rolled up. He could see the empty trunk.

The door nearly slammed on his hand as the woman sped off.

The cop was out of his car. He spotted Will and nodded toward the parking structure, indicating he'd go check it out.

Will jogged a few yards ahead, thinking he should search the second pedestrian tunnel at the opposite end of the breezeway. Maybe the man had gone back into the airport. He was probably spooked. The rendezvous point was compromised. If this man knew what he was doing, he wouldn't panic. At least not for long.

Will stopped running.

There had to be a backup plan. There was always a backup plan.

Will looked into the lower parking lot, his eyes scanning back and forth like a pendulum as he searched in vain for any sign of the man or girl. No bad wig. No green jacket. No cargo pants. No little tights-clad foot missing a pink shoe.

No Atlanta Police officer checking between the cars.

Where was he?

Will took out the TSA agent's cell phone. The screen showed a missed call. Faith. Will hit the green button to call her back. He stared at the parking lot as he listened to the rings, wondering if the guy had already gotten into a car. If he had, there was no way he'd be able to drive out without being caught. Will knew the procedure. Code Adam. Missing child. It took a full fifteen minutes to shut everything down, but they started with the exit points. Each car would be stopped at the parking booths. Trunks would be searched. Seats would be pulled out. Names and licenses would be verified.

Faith answered the phone after two rings. "We've got a Levi's Call out. The picture's already on TV. We've blocked all the exits."

"I lost him in the lower parking deck, south side."

"They saw you on the security feed. A team is heading your way."

"I'm not going to wait for them." Will ended the call, tucking the phone back into his pocket as he crossed the street.

The red truck idled in front of the entrance to the parking deck. The Cowboy reached out to the machine for a ticket. The caution arm swung up. The truck rolled forward. Will followed it into the garage, using the truck as a shield. He saw groups of people heading into the terminal, suitcases and phones in their hands.

The only person walking away from the terminal was an older man in a baseball hat. His hair was white. He was wearing a black jacket and tan shorts. He was about Will's height, maybe a few pounds heavier. He had something gripped in his hand. Tiny, about the size of his palm. Will put his hand in his own pocket. He felt the little girl's shoe, and he knew it was the same man.

Where was the girl?

Will spun around, trying to find her. There was no one. Not even the Atlanta cop. The parking lot was suddenly empty of people, probably because no one was being let in. Will dropped to the ground, checking under the cars, trying to see two small feet, praying in vain that the little girl was playing hide-and-seek and everything would be okay.

But there was nothing. Nothing except the man. Will pushed himself back up. He saw the red truck making the turn onto the ramp leading up to the next level.

Then he saw the man. No more wig. No more baseball hat. No more glasses. He was staring directly at Will. He had the same snarky smile on his face. He was walking backward, hands in the pockets of his reversible jacket. His hairy legs showed where he'd unzipped the bottom part of his cargo pants to turn them into shorts. His white socks looked perfectly normal with his gray sneakers.

For a split second, Will found himself wondering if the man had worn the shoes because he knew he'd have to run. And then the answer became obvious. The man started walking faster. He kept his eyes on Will until the last minute, then spun around and took off running up the ramp.

Will's feet pounded into the concrete as he gave chase. His fists clenched. His arms pumped. He felt the weight of the tiny shoe in his suit jacket as it tapped against his leg, like a child who wanted his attention. The little girl had his attention now. He should've grabbed her in the bathroom. He should've shut down the airport first thing. Why hadn't he listened to his instincts? Why had he cared about getting into trouble when there was even the slightest chance that a child might be in danger?

Will's ankle twisted as he rounded the corner and bolted up the ramp. The man was at least fifty yards ahead, passing the red truck. His shoes squeaked on the concrete as he made the turn up to the next level.

"Hey!" Will called, banging his fist against the back of the pickup. The Cowboy turned around, but Will was already climbing into the bed of the truck. "Go!" Will shouted. "Follow him!"

If there were questions in the Cowboy's mind, he didn't ask them. He floored the gas, tires sending up smoke as the truck accelerated up the ramp. Will tried to brace himself, kneeling down low, gripping either side of the truck bed for balance. At the last possible moment, the Cowboy wrenched the wheel, taking the turn up to the next level. Will was thrown to the opposite side of the truck. His shoulder slammed into the metal edge. There was no time to assess the damage. The man was already making the turn up the next ramp.

The Cowboy sped up again. Will thought he was going to try to run the man over. Apparently, so did the man. He abruptly changed direction, heading toward the exit stairwell with his head tucked, fists clenched.

Will felt his brain click off. It was a sort of survival mechanism, or maybe it was a death wish. The man was a few yards from the exit door. There wasn't much time. Will pushed himself up. He used the edge of the truck as a jumping board, catapulting his body directly toward the man.

Slow motion.

The man's hand was out, reaching for the doorknob. He turned. His mouth opened in surprise, or maybe horror.

Will slammed into him like a pile driver. The guy flattened out to the ground, arms and legs spreading from the force of 185 pounds of pressure. Will felt the breath leave his lungs. He saw literal stars behind his eyelids. He blinked, trying to clear his vision. That's when he saw it. Hello Kitty. Pink trim. The little girl's shoe was still gripped in the man's fist.

"All right," the Cowboy said. He had a Sig Sauer pointed down at them. Nine millimeter. Will guessed he kept it in the glove box of his truck. Most of these guys did. "You gonna tell me what this asshole did?"

Will couldn't talk yet. He gulped air. His lungs rattled. Finally, he was able to force himself up. It was a challenge not to fall back over. Will's nose was bleeding. His ears were ringing. Every muscle in his body ached. Still, he forced his knee into the man's back, pinning him flat to the ground. "Where is she?"

The man shook his head side to side. His mouth opened as he gasped for air.

"Who did you give her to?" Will pressed his knee harder into the man's back. "Where is she?"

Low moans came from his open mouth. His head was turned toward his wrist. He was looking at his watch again. The glass was shattered. He made a strangled sound. Will thought for a second that the man was crying.

And then he realized he was wrong.

The man was laughing.

“You’re too late,” the bastard said. “You’re too late.”

Both the Clayton and Fulton County sheriffs' departments were called in. The Hapeville Police Department. The College Park Police Department. The Atlanta Police Department. The Georgia Bureau of Investigation. Every available law enforcement office with any jurisdiction over the airport had sent all available resources.

And still there was no sign of the girl.

Every car leaving the airport had been checked. North, South, West, Gold, Park-Ride—every vehicle in every parking structure had been examined and reexamined. The service alleys and cargo areas had been searched. Trash collection. Delivery vehicles. Shuttle parking. Rental car parking. Employee parking. Checked and checked again.

They found nothing.

All they had was the man, who wouldn't speak except to say that he would be acting as his own attorney and that his client had no comment.

His pockets were empty. No ID, no cash, not even a piece of gum. They hadn't found his glasses, wig, or the zippered-off legs of his cargo pants. He'd refused the offer of food and drink. He'd said he didn't smoke. He obviously knew these were common tricks employed by the police to obtain fingerprints and DNA, just as he obviously knew all he had to do was wait out the twenty-four-hour holding period, after which they had to either charge him or let him go.

Amanda Wagner hadn't transferred the man to the downtown jail. She was keeping him at the airport precinct, which was just as good as her home turf.

Will could tell his boss wanted to beat the man senseless. They all did. Every cop who passed the window looking into the cells seemed tensed, ready to break the glass and do as much damage as they could before someone stopped them. Not that anyone would stop them.

Will sure as hell wouldn't. It brought him nothing but pleasure to see the blood dripping from the man's mouth where Will had slammed his face into the concrete floor. If given half a chance, he'd pull the rest of the teeth out with his bare hands.

"Run it through for me again," Amanda told Will. She was normally composed, but today she was pacing, her three-inch heels catching on the cheap carpet inside the airport precinct offices.

"They were in the bathroom," Will began. "I heard them in the stall next to mine." He went through the story a second time, telling her every detail, from the photo he took with the pilot's phone to his leap off the Cowboy's truck.

Amanda wasn't testing him. She was making Will talk it through in case there was something he'd missed, or something that she would look at differently.

Will could see her silently repeating his story back in her head as she watched officers running back and forth across the squad room.

Finally, she said, "We need to find that disguise, figure out how he managed to sneak her out right under our noses.”

Will thought the “we” was fairly generous, considering the girl had gone missing under his watch. He was about to say as much when the door opened. The room snapped to attention.

Commander Vanessa Livingston usually kept her long hair braided into a bun that stayed hidden beneath her hat. Today was her day off, though, so instead of wearing her uniform, she was dressed in blue jeans and a flowing blue blouse. Obviously, the men who normally worked under her were taken aback by any sign of femininity in their usually severe boss. None of them could look her in the eye, though they all seemed to be in suspended animation as they waited for her to speak.

“Nothing,” she said. “I checked the international terminal myself. The incinerator hasn’t gone off yet.” Will knew that customs was required by law to burn anything illegally brought into the country—usually fruits and vegetables. “I had one of my boys climb around inside, but it was just the usual crap people try to bring in.”

“It was worth a shot.” Amanda sounded as disappointed as they all felt.

Vanessa snapped her fingers at the men assembled in the room. “Report?”

The sergeant stood up. “The rental car companies and shuttles were a dead end. We called all the chauffeur services—legal and illegal. None of them report picking up a single adult with a child, two adults with a child, or a child alone.”

She nodded for him to get back to work, telling Amanda and Will, “It’s Monday. We generally see children traveling on weekends and holidays, so a kid would stick out.”

Amanda walked over to the map of the downtown corridor that was pinned to the wall. She tapped her finger on various points as she caught Vanessa up on their actions so far. “Marriott. Embassy Suites. Renaissance. Hilton. Westin. Holiday Inn. We’ve got at least thirty airport hotels, more if you stretch to College Park. I’ve pulled in all GBI field agents and invoked an Action Alert so that local police forces can help search. This, as you know, is our problem.” She traced a circle around I-75, I-85, I-20, I-285, all the major arteries that led away from the city. “We’re assuming the girl was handed off approximately forty-five minutes ago. That’s enough time to reach the Alabama state line. If he’s heading to Tennessee or the Carolinas, we’ve got approximately two more hours before he’s out of our jurisdiction. I’ve alerted Florida in case he’s going south.”

“Screw that,” Vanessa said. “We’ll take care of these assholes ourselves.”

She used her keycard to buzz them into the command center, which was euphemistically called the Cold Room.

Will let Amanda enter ahead of him. He felt the temperature drop as soon as his foot crossed the threshold. The Cold Room was kept at a cool sixty-five degrees so that the banks of computers could work at their most efficient levels. Every camera at the airport fed into this one room, which looked as if it had taken its design cues from NASA. Rows of desks were tiered like stadium seating. Each station had three monitors, and since that still wasn’t enough, dozens more monitors lined the front wall.

Will guessed the room was the size of a basketball gymnasium, with an upper level that looked down on it all like a suite at a stadium. This is where Vanessa stood, Amanda at her side, Will behind them. They watched the real-time action of the airport, which was slowly revving back up.

Almost fifty percent of Delta's intercontinental flights laid over at Hartsfield, which meant their schedule had been shot to hell today. None of the passengers on the monitors looked happy. They were all taking it personally that their flights had been canceled or delayed. That a little girl had been snatched seemed a bad justification for missing their flight out. Vanessa's team had already broken up a nasty fistfight in front of one of the ticketing desks.

Vanessa explained, "We've got every inch of the interior facilities covered. The parking garages are spotty—we've got most of the pedestrian walkways covered and of course cameras are on every car that enters and exits. I've already instructed my people to run every image through the face recognition software."

Faith Mitchell stuck up her head from the sea of desks. She told Amanda, "We're ready to go."

Amanda glanced at her friend, on whose turf they were standing, but Vanessa only grunted, "Please."

Faith looked back down at the desk. She'd always been good with electronics. A few taps on the keyboard and she was in complete control of the system.

The largest monitor on the wall flickered, and Will saw himself peering around the bathroom exit. The next monitor in the row showed the man wearing his bad wig and glasses. He was dragging the girl across the concourse, making a beeline toward the escalator. Will heard the tapping of keys as Faith isolated the images. Yet another monitor showed a frozen still of the man's face. His wig was skewed. His glasses were halfway down his nose. Then came the girl's face. She looked absolutely stricken.

Will felt all eyes on him. Looking at it from a distance, the crime was obvious.

Amanda mumbled, "It was a tough call," which was probably the most generous thing she'd ever said.

Faith hit some more keys. The middle monitor sped back up, tracing the path Will had followed through the airport. When Will exited at the T concourse, the train camera tracked the man until he exited at baggage claim. He struggled to get off the train quickly, but was beaten in the rush to the escalators because the girl was holding him back. Instead of climbing the stairs, he took the elevator. The corner-mounted camera inside the car showed him furiously pressing the button to close the doors even as an older woman in a wheelchair approached.

The doors closed in her face. Again, the man looked at his watch.

Amanda asked, "How late was his plane?"

"Fifteen minutes," Vanessa said. "It was one of the first out, so we know he didn't put the girl on a connecting flight."

They had already tracked the man back to his arrival gate in the C concourse. His American Airlines flight had left Seattle's Sea-Tac International Airport this morning. It was a smaller airport, but fortunately was in compliance with Homeland Security's new safety protocols. Every passenger who'd ever flown in a plane knew that their boarding pass was always scanned by the gate agent. What they didn't realize was that there was a camera trained on their face the entire time so that the footage could later be matched to a name.

Sea-Tac had emailed the digital files ten minutes ago. Four techs were already working on finding the man's identity.

Vanessa said, "Neither Seattle nor Tacoma PD have taken a missing child report matching our girl's age range in the last seventy-two hours. They've sent a notice to all schools within a hundred-mile radius. It's on the airwaves. Her photo's everywhere."

Amanda asked, "Seattle's what—a three-hour drive from Vancouver?"

"We've already coordinated with the Mounties and border patrol. If she passed through one of the four main checkpoints into the U.S., they'll find her."

"There's no telling where she came from," Amanda pointed out. "She could've been driven up from Tijuana, for all we know."

"LAX is running film for us. All the international airports from here to the West Coast. It's a needle in a haystack, but they'll comb every piece to find a kid," Vanessa said. "Let's pull up her picture again."

Faith did the honors. The photo of the stolen girl took center stage. There was a pause, then a flurry of typing as people went back to work. Will stared at the girl, his mind filling with all kinds of what-ifs. What if he'd grabbed her in the bathroom? What if he'd stopped the man, questioned him?

"About what? Why he wanted the little girl to hurry up and use the toilet?"

"Got him!" someone yelled. "Joseph Allen Jenner."

The little girl's photo disappeared and in its place was the man. He stood in line behind a group of travelers in matching yellow shirts, probably part of a cruise trip en route to Florida.

Jenner was wearing the same jacket, green side out. His hair was white. No wig. No glasses. No baseball cap. Will guessed from his bulky jacket that these items were in the pockets. Security couldn't stop you for traveling with a wig.

Faith asked, "Where's the kid?"

She was right. Jenner was alone.

"Scan back through the passengers," Vanessa ordered.

"Already on it," a man answered.

Faith turned back to her keyboard. Her work showed on one of the smaller screens. She was running Jenner through CODIS, the FBI's national DNA database of convicted offenders. "Nothing," she said, though they could see as much for themselves. She ran Jenner through the state system, then the regional, trying to find any record of arrest or registration as a sex offender. Finally, she Googled the man.

Pay dirt.

"He's a tax lawyer," Faith said. She clicked and scrolled through various articles in The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, calling out her findings as she skimmed the information. Jenner wasn't the type to fly below the radar. The guy did pro bono work for a children's charity. He coached little league baseball. He was a certified lifeguard who helped out at the local YMCA.

"Typical," Amanda muttered. "They always hide in plain sight."

"Found the kid." The Sea-Tac footage sped up, and a short, round woman was shown holding the girl in her arms. The child was obviously too big to be held. The woman nearly buckled under her weight.

"The woman is Eleanor Fielding," the guy supplied. "Kid's listed as Abigail Fielding."

Vanessa asked, "Is she still with the kid when they land?"

The footage cut back to the gate in Atlanta. Will saw a line of passengers exiting the boarding door. They looked tired and confused, the way most people did when they sat in a metal tube for five hours and landed in a completely different city. All of them searched for signs, looking for either the exit or their next gate.

Fielding was in the second wave of passengers coming up the jetway. She didn't look confused at all as she walked into the terminal. She headed off with purpose, almost jogging toward the escalators to the underground train.

Vanessa ordered, "Stay on the door."

The film sped up, but not so much that they couldn't make out the faces. The tech was good. The film was back at normal speed when Joseph Allen Jenner's face came on-screen. He was one of the last passengers off the plane. He was holding the girl's hand, dragging her along. Instead of heading toward the exit, he took her to an adjoining gate. A second and third camera tracked their progress as he led her to the back wall and forced her to sit in a chair. The girl was still groggy. She yawned, looking around with seemingly unfocused eyes.

"She looks drugged," Amanda noted.

"That's fairly common," Vanessa supplied. She'd worked at the airport long enough to know how these people operated. "We had a kid abducted on the West Coast last year. Drugged out of his mind. Flight attendants assumed he was sleeping, which is what you want from a kid on a long flight. He was passed off at the international terminal and on his way to Amsterdam by the time LAX tracked the internal flight."

"Did you recover him?" Will asked.

Vanessa nodded, but Will could tell from her expression that the kid hadn't escaped unscathed. Not many of them did.

Stranger abductions were rare—statistically, a kid was much more likely to be harmed by a family member—but the Internet was making things easier for predators. Will had been involved in a sting several years ago where a man took photos of kids on the playground and posted them to a private chat room. His plan was to snatch a kid that he could trade with another predator. It was a pedophile's version of the old Sears Wish Book. The man had been arrested, but these assholes were like cockroaches. For every one you caught, there were thousands hiding in the walls.

Like Joseph Allen Jenner.

On the security footage, it was obvious that the little girl was coming around. She was more awake now, taking in her surroundings, fidgeting in the chair. Jenner was visibly on edge. He kept looking at his watch, checking the time against the clock on the wall.

"He's waiting for something," Vanessa said. "Fast-forward."

The tape sped up almost ten full minutes. Jenner took another look at his watch and snatched up the girl by the arm. He tried to move her forward, but she stopped, standing rooted in place. Her mouth moved as she spoke, probably asking to be taken to the restroom. Jenner looked furious. She was throwing off his perfect timing.

He dragged her into the bathroom, where security cameras could not reach.

"Where's Fielding while all of this is happening?" Vanessa demanded. "I want to know how she got out of here."

"We lost her," one of the techs said. "Fielding left through the North Terminal. We don't know where she went from there."

Will said, "Jenner disappeared in the South Terminal."

"Put more people on the parking exit videos," Vanessa ordered. Will knew more than two hundred cars had left the airport in the forty-five minutes between the Seattle plane landing and the airport being shut down.

"Fielding's got a record," Faith said. She pulled up the woman's mugshot. "Simple battery, child neglect. Two years ago in Jackson, Mississippi. She's off probation. No registered Atlanta address." The mugshot was replaced by Eleanor Fielding's arrest report.

"My God," Amanda mumbled. "She was a foster parent."

"We got her at the exit," the earlier man said. "She was one of the first cars we stopped. Fielding left through long-term parking, North Terminal. Black Mercedes." He flashed up the car, which had been captured on the security camera at the main exit to the parking area. The Mercedes was thoroughly searched. The trunk was popped. The back seat and floorboard were checked. A mirror was even dragged under the car to inspect the chassis. The woman stood there with her hands on her hips, conveying what a huge inconvenience this all was.

Will checked the time stamp on the footage. Twelve fifty-two. He remembered Jenner checking his watch twenty minutes later.

"There she goes," Amanda said as Fielding got back into her Mercedes and drove off. The camera tracked her to the split at the interstate. She took 75 South.

Faith said, "Fielding paid for the flight for her and the girl with her AmEx card. It goes to a local address on Lake Spivey. The Emerald Drive address matches her driver's license."

"Call Clayton County and tell them to bring her in," Vanessa told one of her men. The guy jogged toward the door.

Faith said, "She flew out yesterday afternoon, so it was up and back."

Amanda asked, "What about Jenner's flight?"

There was a pause as Faith looked up the information. "Up and back, too. He left three hours before Fielding did. His flights were booked with a Visa card," she said. "Belongs to Eleanor Fielding. Tracks back to the same Emerald Drive address." Faith gave an incredulous snort. "She used her SkyMiles to upgrade their tickets."

"Fewer questions in first class," Vanessa noted.

"It was an overnight trip," Amanda said. "Where did they stay?"

Faith did some more quick typing. The screen showed a credit card receipt. "Hilton Seattle Airport and Conference Center," she said. "Two-hundred-six-dollar charge." She pulled up the website for the hotel. After a few clicks, she'd managed to pull up the room options. "A two-double-bed room with the light-rail package that takes you to and from the airport is a hundred thirty-four bucks. With tax, meals, I'd guess that'd put them at around the two-hundred-dollar mark." Faith went back to the credit card receipts. "No rental car on either credit card. Looks like they stayed at the hotel and waited."

Amanda said, "And then someone delivered a little girl to their door."

The room went silent. They all stared at the photo Will had taken of the little girl. Abigail. Maybe that was her real name. They would want to make sure she responded if called. These were the types of people who thought about such things. They booked the tickets ahead of time. They coordinated the exchanges. The Emerald Drive address was probably nothing more than a drop. Eleanor Fielding wouldn't be there. No one would be there.

Will felt the enormity of the situation start to overwhelm him. The little girl had been so close to him in the bathroom. He could've reached out and grabbed her. He could've knelt down and asked her if the man was her father. He could've punched the guy in the face and taken her away from him.

Vanessa said, "He's invoked legal counsel. We can't talk to him. What's your plan?"

Amanda didn't hesitate. "We talk to his lawyer."

three

Joseph Allen Jenner was a fifty-two-year-old widower. His wife had passed away three years ago. Her obituary listed natural causes, though a call to a sympathetic records supervisor at Emory University hospital revealed she'd had a heart attack at the age of forty-eight. No children were mentioned. Her only survivor was listed as Joe Jenner, lawyer, philanthropist, president of the Jenner Children's Foundation, which helped underprivileged children get access to after-school literacy programs.

Amanda sat across from Jenner in the interrogation room of the airport precinct. The walls were a crisp white, absent the usual scuff marks, cobwebs, and dirt that Will saw in just about every police station he'd stepped foot in.

She said, "I'm Deputy Director Amanda Wagner with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. This is my associate, Special Agent Will Trent."

Jenner held a bloodied rag to his mouth. His voice was muffled but clear. "I'm not required by law to say anything to you."

Amanda said, "You obviously know your rights, Mr. Jenner. I would expect nothing less from a tax attorney."

Jenner's eyebrow went up, though that was the only indication of surprise that they'd already learned his name. He took away the rag. "In that case, I'd like some ice water, please. And some aspirin."

Amanda nodded toward the two-way mirror. Will guessed Vanessa Livingston was repeating the gesture to one of her minions.

Amanda told Jenner, "You came in on American three-sixty-two this morning. You boarded the plane alone. Your partner, Ms. Fielding, boarded behind you. She was carrying a child whose boarding pass identified her as Abigail Fielding."

Jenner didn't comment.

"Ms. Fielding's credit cards were used to purchase three tickets. One for you, one for her, and one for the little girl. It is Abigail, isn't it? We don't know what to call her."

Again, Jenner kept his own counsel. He looked at the table. Will guessed his teeth were aching, especially the jagged bits where they'd been cracked in two.

Amanda asked, "Who did you hand Abigail off to, Mr. Jenner?"

Jenner gave a chest-rattling sigh. "Deputy Director Wagner," he began. "Surely, you're familiar with the law. You're not allowed to question me once I ask for a lawyer."

"As you are your own counsel, Mr. Jenner, I am speaking to you in the capacity of a law enforcement official to a legal representative. If you'd like for me to use more formal language, I'd be happy to oblige."

He stared at her, his brow furrowed. Will guessed the man was more conversant with Cayman Island tax shelters than the loopholes of criminal law. Finally, he gave a crooked grin. "Very good, Deputy Director. It's refreshing to speak to someone on your side of the law who actually has a brain in his head."

He corrected himself. "Her head."

Amanda gave a tight smile. "What a wonderful compliment."

He laughed. "You people think you're so smart, but what's really going to happen here? You can only hold me for twenty-four hours. You've got nothing concrete with which to charge me. It's really rather pathetic."

Amanda said, "Mr. Jenner, at this moment, your client—Mr. Jenner—is facing charges of child abduction, transporting a minor across state lines for the purpose of sexual activity, child trafficking, impeding a police investigation, evading arrest, resisting arrest, and assaulting a police officer."

"Assault?" Jenner sounded outraged. "He attacked me. I was just walking toward the stairs, minding my own business." He held up his busted watch. "This is a six-thousand-dollar Rolex."

"We have a witness, a Mr. McGhee, who remembers it differently." The Cowboy in the red pickup truck. Travis McGhee's background check had been squeaky clean, but he'd told Will he'd swear on a stack of Bibles that Jenner had asked for it. That Will hadn't gotten around to asking the man to lie was only mildly surprising.

"Witness, huh?" Jenner was still unimpressed. The smug look on his face made Will want to break the rest of his teeth. "Really, Deputy Director. You're boring me at this point. Can't you come up with something interesting?"

Amanda said, "Mr. Jenner, you realize your client was on camera from the moment he stepped foot inside the airport?" To send the point home, she fanned out the still photographs the techs had taken from the security footage. "This one is particularly interesting. See where your client is wearing a wig and glasses here?" She pointed to the photo. "And yet, here, it seems he took off the wig and glasses. And, of course, once we got him into custody, we learned that he'd reversed his jacket and changed his pants into shorts. What do you think a jury will make of that?"

"I doubt a jury will hear any of it." He glanced down at the table again. "It's always nice to have visual aids, isn't it? Though who that man is in the bad wig is beyond me."

Will followed his gaze. Jenner wasn't looking at the photos. He was trying to see Will's watch. Will resisted the urge to cover his wrist. The cuff of his sleeve obscured the dial.

Jenner said, "As I stated earlier, you can only hold me for twenty-four hours."

"That's correct," Amanda told him. "But a lot can happen in twenty-four hours."

"You're right," Jenner agreed. "Maybe my client will change his mind about that deal. You never know."

Will told Amanda, "Maybe we should check on Ms. Fielding."

Amanda had done this for so long that her face barely registered a change in expression. She said, "Yes. She seemed more talkative than our friend here."

Jenner couldn't hide his curiosity, though he tried. "Who's Ms. Fielding?"

"Your partner in the black Mercedes."

Jenner smirked.

Amanda said, "I'm sure she'll be more forthcoming. Ms. Fielding's been in the system before. She knows a jury won't look kindly on a second charge."

"She's invoked counsel," Jenner said. A good guess, Will supposed, if they'd actually been able to find the woman. “You can’t talk to her without a lawyer present.”

Amanda stood from the table. “We’ll make sure you get your ice water, though I’m afraid it’s against the law for us to give prisoners any drugs, harmless as aspirin may seem.”

Jenner waved his hand, dismissing her words. “I’ll be here when you want to talk again.” He actually winked at her. “Shaking in my boots, as it were.”

She left the pictures on the table. Will followed her outside the room.

Amanda waited until the door was closed. Still, she kept her voice low. “He’s trying to see your watch.”

Will nodded. “There’s another hand-off. Fielding’s supposed to meet someone else.”

“It would make sense,” Amanda said. “He’s smug for a reason. You know he’s done this before. They trade these kids like used cars, moving them around the country so no one can track them.” Her tone held a low fury. “I’m sure Jenner’s been on the receiving end a few times.”

Vanessa joined them. She had a sheet of paper in her hand. “Nothing on our end. The Lake Spivey house is vacant. It’s been in foreclosure for two years. There was mail in the box addressed to Eleanor Fielding. The neighbor’s a bit nosy, says a black Mercedes comes by once or twice a week and picks up mail. The car is registered to that address, too.”

“Smart,” Amanda said. “She’s using the house as a drop.”

“Fielding’s last known address is a vacant lot. I’ve got a gal at Social Security who’s going to try to give us a hand, but I’m not sure how long that’ll take.”

“Did you get an address on Jenner?”

“He lives and works at the Residences at the Ritz-Carlton. We talked with the head of security there, but he wasn’t willing to play ball, even when we told him a kid was involved. We can’t search Jenner’s apartment or office without a warrant. The attendant at the front desk is retired Atlanta Police. He accidentally left his logbook open for us. No visitors with kids. Not seeing Jenner—not seeing anyone. It’s not a child-friendly kind of place. No other addresses listed for him, so that’s a dead end. What about you?” Vanessa nodded toward the room. “You get anything out of him?”

“Just that he’s an arrogant asshole,” Amanda admitted. “Will thinks there’s another hand-off. I’m prone to agree. Jenner’s waiting for something. His watch is broken. He tried to look at Will’s several times.”

Will guessed, “He’s going to try to make a plea deal when he’s sure the next hand-off has happened. He’ll tell us where to find Abigail. It won’t be his fault when she’s not there.”

Vanessa provided, “All the airport hotels are checking out clean. We’ve sent agents there to look at footage with their own eyes. We’re not taking anybody’s word on this.” She crossed her arms. “Wherever Abigail is being hidden, it’s not in plain sight. What’re you thinking, Will?”

Will looked down at his watch. The hands showed two-fifteen. Will pulled out the stem and moved the hands ahead thirty minutes. “I’m thinking it’s time we let Jenner go to the bathroom.”

four

Will kept Jenner in cuffs as he led the man down the corridor to the men's room. He expected protests or outrage, but maybe part of Jenner knew that he deserved to be duckwalked like a prisoner. Or maybe he was so certain he'd get out of this that he was content to suffer the small travails.

"Here," Will said, holding open the door. His sleeve pulled back. He saw Jenner note the time. Obviously, he liked what he saw. The snarky smile was back.

Will followed him into the small room. One toilet. One sink. An overhead fan that rattled like an old man's lungs. Will took out his handcuff key and removed the bracelets. Jenner rubbed his wrists, trying to get the circulation back into them. He asked Will, "What were you doing in that bathroom?"

"I'll answer if you do."

Jenner smiled, showing his cracked teeth. He winced from the pain. "You should feel lucky I'm not going to sue you for dental costs." He turned back to the sink, his eye on Will's as he turned on the hot water faucet. "I'm sure implants will run into the tens of thousands."

"You've got the money."

"Do I?" he asked. He must've read the answer in Will's eyes. "I guess you tracked my name through my boarding pass. I wonder how? I didn't have it on me. Maybe one of my fellow passengers gave up my seat number?"

Will shrugged.

"The credit card wouldn't go back to me. Google, maybe?"

Will didn't answer.

"It's amazing how privacy has gone out the window since 9/11. I'm surprised you haven't marked me for rendition."

"We're looking into it."

Jenner chuckled good-naturedly. He cupped some warm water into his hands, leaned down, and slurped. Will waited as he swished the water around inside his mouth. Jenner spat a pink stream of blood into the sink. He repeated the process twice before he stood back up. "I know Eleanor isn't talking. Her lawyer makes your boss look like a puppy dog."

Will doubted that, though he took on board that Eleanor Fielding probably had a woman for a lawyer. Will should've known better, but he was always surprised by the awful things some women got up to. He wanted to think it was for the money and not for spite. Or worse.

"She's quite a piece of work," Jenner said, meaning Amanda. "Thinks she's smarter than she is. It's a cop's curse."

Will wasn't feeling so smart at the moment. So far, Jenner had managed to play him like a fiddle. Will tried to feed into the man's ego, saying, "You're smart."

"That I am," Jenner agreed. "It really is a burden sometimes—to be smarter than everyone else.” He indicated the toilet, which was side-on to the sink. “You mind?”

Will turned his back to the man, though he could still see his reflection in the mirror. Jenner’s gaze stayed down. He obviously wasn’t going to try anything.

Will felt for the stem of his watch. He inched the hands forward a bit more. It was a delicate balance. In the last twenty-four hours, Jenner had traveled across three time zones and back. He would be tired from the flights. Maybe exhausted from adrenaline and caffeine. The stewardess on his flight said he’d drunk at least a whole pot of coffee during the four-and-a-half-hour journey.

Even an innocent person would be feeling disoriented right now.

“Ahh,” Jenner let out a needlessly dramatic sigh as he finished at the toilet. He shook himself a few times. He flushed, then turned toward the door.

Will blocked his way, nodding toward the faucet.

“Of course. Where are my manners?” Jenner went to the sink. He pumped some soap into his palm, then held his hand under the faucet sensor. Nothing happened. “I hate these damn things. They never work.”

Will didn’t bother to agree with him. He waved his hand under the sensor. Still no water. Will tried again. The water came on hard and fast, splashing up on both of them.

“Always happens,” Jenner said, lathering his hands.

Will looked down at his pants. They were wet in the front, the same as Jenner’s.

The faucet cut off. Jenner said, “Towel?”

Will pulled a few paper towels out of the dispenser, making sure his watch showed. He caught Jenner’s reflection in the mirror. If the man was surprised that time was flying by, he didn’t seem to register it.

Again, Jenner turned toward the door.

Again, Will blocked him. He took out his handcuffs.

“Really?” Jenner asked. He sounded disappointed, as if they had somehow bonded in the toilet. Finally, he held out his hands.

Will shook his head. With exaggerated reluctance, Jenner turned around. He held out his hands behind him. It took everything inside Will not to wrench Jenner’s arms up so hard that both his rotator cuffs ripped. Instead, he carefully placed the handcuffs on the man’s wrists and snapped them closed.

Will opened the door. He let Jenner walk out on his own steam, not pushing him or kicking him down the hallway. Will wanted so badly to move his watch forward, to inch away the time, but he made himself keep one hand on Jenner’s elbow and the other at his side. Will put his hand in his jacket pocket. Abigail’s little shoe was still there. He should put it in evidence. He should log it for trial.

Will wrapped his hand around the slipper. It almost disappeared in his grip.

Will sat on a metal bench outside the airport. It was a bright, sunny day, but he’d chosen the underground breezeway as the spot to lick his wounds. This was where he’d lost sight of Joe Jenner. The cop had pulled up. Travis McGhee had beeped the horn in his red truck. Will had turned around and Jenner and the girl were gone.

He held Abigail’s shoe in his hand. The trim was coming off in the back, probably from being dragged. He should get some superglue and fix it. Will imagined these were the type of shoes a little girl might love. She'd want them back. She'd need them when she got back on a plane and headed home to her parents.

Will closed his eyes. He was hardly some kind of New Age freak, but he tried to imagine Abigail safe in her mother's arms. The little girl was thin and bony. Her mother probably would be, too. They'd have the same yellow-blond hair and blue eyes. Abigail's mother would hold on to her and squeeze her so tight that Abigail would never get away again.

That was what he wanted to imagine, not the truth, which was probably closer to a nightmare.

The Levi's Call was still in effect. Highway patrol had scrambled every cop on their payroll to scour the inter-states and back roads. All the DOT bulletin boards over the highways listed Abigail's height, weight, eye and hair color, approximate age, and the time in which she'd gone missing. Hundreds of calls had already come in, but none of them had panned out.

Will looked at his watch, which was still ahead by fifty minutes. He kept checking on Jenner, inching the hands forward on his watch each time before he went into the room and offered a soda or a toilet break or just sat across from him and watched Jenner stare blankly at the wall.

Will would adjust his watch up another twenty minutes before he went back in with the man. Jenner was clearly exhausted. The last two times Will had checked on him, he'd been asleep, his head on the table. He'd clearly lost track of time. Another five minutes skipped forward. Another ten. There was no telling what the magic hour was, but Will would keep leading Jenner along, moving the time ahead, until Jenner felt like he was safe.

Their only hope was that they'd have enough time left to save the girl.

Abigail had been missing for three hours now—at least that they knew of. There was no telling where she'd come from before that, whether or not a mother and father were looking for her. Eleanor Fielding had worked in social services. Maybe Abigail was a foster child.

So much for the image of Abigail in her mother's arms.

Predators tended to pick easy targets, and the foster system was so bereft of funding that caseworkers could barely keep up anymore. Many of them didn't have cell phones, laptops, or sometimes even offices. Seattle alone had seen dozens of child deaths in the foster system. Florida had a habit of losing their kids. Washington, D.C., had so many neglect cases on the books that they could barely adjudicate them all. There was no telling whether or not Abigail was one of the missing.

At this late hour, she might already be one of the dead.

The doors behind Will slid open. Faith sat down beside him on the bench. She had a radio in her hand. It was tuned to the Atlanta Police frequency, the volume turned down low. Will could hear the soft murmur of cops chattering back and forth.

Faith said, "Nothing," because she knew that was the first thing he'd ask. "Is that her shoe?"

Will handed Faith the ballet slipper with its pink trim and smiling Hello Kitty.

"It's so small." Faith pressed her lips tightly together. She had a daughter in diapers and a son in college. As hard as these cases hit everyone, they seemed to hit Faith doubly so.

Will asked, "How old do you have to be before you dress yourself?"

Faith sighed as she thought it through. "It varies from kid to kid. You're pointing things out that you want to wear around two, two and a half, but you can't dress yourself. Three or four, you're putting stuff on, but sometimes it's backward or you put the wrong shoe on the wrong foot. By five, you're pretty much able to dress on your own. Unless you're a boy. Then, you can't do it until you're at least twenty-five. Maybe thirty."

Will allowed a smile at the attempted levity, but all he could think about was Abigail picking out her clothes. This morning or yesterday or whenever it was, she'd taken the flowery dress, the matching tights and shoes, and put them on herself. He imagined her smiling at her reflection in the mirror, maybe twirling around.

Faith interrupted his thoughts. "The FBI is chomping to take this over."

"I'm sure Amanda's happy about that."

"They're not being assholes," Faith allowed. "They're giving her everything she's asks for. Nobody wants this thing blowing up in our faces."

Will didn't say that he thought it had exploded a few hours ago. "I keep thinking of her with her mother."

"That's something good to hold on to. I'm going to think about that, too."

"You know it's not likely."

Faith said, "I don't care if it takes the rest of my life, Joe Jenner's going to end up in jail."

Will nodded, hoping that didn't end up being their consolation prize.

"I don't see how you managed to sit across from the smug prick without beating him senseless."

"It's what he wants," Will realized. That was why Jenner kept antagonizing them. Part of it was the lawyer's sense of superiority, but a greater part was the satisfaction he got from seeing the police so out of control.

Faith said, "It's the only crime I don't understand." She handed back the shoe. "Robbery, murder, even rape I can sort of get. But a kid?" She shook her head. "It's disgusting. Something is seriously wrong with a person who would do that."

Will didn't know what to say. It seemed pointless to agree with her.

He sat back on the bench and stared at the underground parking garage. He'd spent the last thirty minutes going through each step he'd taken after he followed Jenner outside. He did it again now: The cop. The Cowboy in the red truck. Running into the garage. Jenner had changed his appearance. How long did that take? Removing the wig and glasses would take two, three seconds, tops. Reversing the jacket and zipping off the bottom part of his pants while still holding on to the girl would be another matter.

Abigail wouldn't have just stood there while he changed. She would've run. Will was certain of that.

Regardless, they hadn't found the wig or any of Jenner's disguise in the many trashcans that were placed around the garage. The stairwells were empty. The spaces between cars absent his stash. Maybe Jenner's hand-off partner had taken everything, but the question remained: how did he or she escape? Every single departing car had been checked. Every exit had been sealed off.

Logic dictated there had to be something they were missing.

Vanessa Livingston had sent a team of men to run the license plate of every vehicle inside the parking structure. According to his driver's license, Jenner had a black Bentley Continental registered in his name. A quick call to the parking attendant at the Ritz-Carlton verified the Bentley was in the residents' area of the garage.

Abigail wasn't secreted away in a vehicle. She wasn't taken out in a service vehicle. She wasn't inside the airport. Was she locked in the trunk of a car? Did Jenner have another automobile hidden in the parking structure? Was his backup plan to simply let the girl suffocate?

Will's throat worked. He felt overwhelmed with the uselessness of it all. The fuzzy picture of mother and child was being replaced with a darker possibility. Will had seen dead children before. The image was hard to get out of your mind. It was the sort of thing you saw when you went to bed at night. It was the sort of thing that popped back into your brain for the rest of your life. Especially times like now.

Abigail.

Why hadn't Will taken her from Jenner? Why hadn't he at least talked to her in the restroom? So what if Jenner had ended up being her father or stepfather or grandfather or uncle. If Will had been on the other side of the situation, if Will had a daughter and some cop stopped him to ask what was going on, he might be mad at first, but then he'd have to appreciate someone looking out for his kid.

Faith, as usual, read his thoughts. "You didn't do anything wrong."

"I should've talked to her."

"If I was in the airport and you leaned down to talk to my kid, I'd kick you in the face so hard your eyes would be spinning before you hit the ground."

"That's different," Will said. Women were more cautious around children. Especially women like Faith Mitchell, who ran a background check on her mailman because she thought he was too friendly.

"It's not different," Faith said. "You did everything you could, Will. We're all doing everything we can."

He hated the defeated sound in her voice, mostly because it mirrored his own feelings.

"I want to run through it again," Will said. Faith nodded, and he started back from the beginning, telling her about sitting in the toilet stall, peeling off the Band-Aid so that the flusher would go off. When he got to the part about waving his arms for the camera in the pedestrian tunnel, he stood up. He told her about finding the shoe, heading out to where they now stood in front of the exit doors.

Will took her down the sidewalk, continuing the story: The red truck. The Cowboy. The cop pulling up in his cruiser. Will's attention was diverted for a few seconds. He lost sight of Jenner and the girl.

Will turned to Faith, remembering, "There was a silver Prius."

"Four door?"

Will nodded. "I heard it pull up behind me."

"If you heard it, then it wasn't going slow," Faith pointed out. The car was virtually silent at speeds under fifteen miles per hour. "Anything else?"

"Black interior. White female driver. I saw through to the trunk. The car was empty." Will tried to remember what the woman looked like. It had all happened so fast. He'd wrenched open the door and scanned the interior of the car. "I scared the shit out of her," he said. "She drove off like a bat out of hell."

"Drove up there?" Faith indicated the steep turn at the end of the breezeway. The four-lane road narrowed to two as it merged into traffic from upstairs. The road then turned back into a six-lane stretch that allowed drivers to either loop back around to the South or North Terminal or jump onto the interstate.

Will said, "Call it in."

Faith already had the radio to her mouth. "Mitchell to Livingston?"

Vanessa Livingston's voice came back immediately. "Ten-four?"

"I need exit tape on a silver Prius leaving the South Terminal breezeway at approximate time of disappearance."

"Roger."

Faith dropped the radio to her side. "Where was the Prius parked when you opened the door?"

Will walked a few more feet and gauged his position. "Right here." He pointed toward the parking garage. "When I saw Jenner again, he was over there."

"Was that when you called me on the phone?"

"Yes."

"Okay, back up," Faith said. "You saw the Prius. You ran up to it?"

"Yeah," Will said. "I opened the door and checked it. No one was inside. Just a woman. Dark hair, I think. She put her hands to her face. Like I said, she was scared. Surprised." He shook his head. There was a reason cops hated eyewitness testimony. Nine times out of ten, it was wrong. So much had been going on when Will was chasing Jenner that he wasn't even sure the Prius was silver anymore. "Like I said, the car was empty. I could see straight through to ..." His voice trailed off. He looked up the road. He could see cars from the upstairs lanes.

Faith asked, "What is it?"

Will didn't answer. Instead, he jogged up the road, taking the same path toward the exit as the Prius.

There was a bend in the lower road as it rose to meet traffic exiting the main terminal entrance. To discourage pedestrians from walking up the road and possibly getting hit by a car, the garden crew had planted a bunch of black locusts, a pollution-resistant bush that produces a creamy white flower and tiny, razor-sharp thorns at the base of each leaf.

Will pushed his way into the dense bushes, not caring that his hands were getting torn up. His jacket got caught on a long branch. The material stuck to the thorns like Velcro.

"What are you doing?"

Will ripped away his jacket so he could go farther into the bushes. "The TSA agent told me it takes fifteen minutes to completely lock down the airport. We were still inside that window when I caught Jenner. The Prius could've left just under the wire."

"But you said the car was empty."

"It was when I searched it." Will stepped onto a branch, pushing down the barbs with his foot. "They both panicked. The Prius took off. Jenner ran into the garage." He glanced at Faith to see if she was following his logic. "The road curves up right here. I was back inside the breezeway talking to you on the phone. This is the only place they could've handed Abigail off without me seeing Jenner or the car."

"Or the security cameras seeing them." Faith put her hands on her hips. "The next camera would pick up the Prius at the split that takes you onto the interstate."

Will's finger was bleeding. He wiped his hand on his pants, stepping deeper into the bushes.

And then he found it.

A cheap brown wig, a pair of black plastic glasses, two legs from a pair of zippered cargo pants and—worst of all—a little girl's flowery dress with pink trim.

five

"It's my fault," Will told Amanda. "I took my eye off Jenner. I gave him the opportunity to make the hand-off."

"We'll deal with your mistakes later," she said. "Tell me again about the woman in the car."

He shook his head. Each time he tried to summon up the memory, it was lost. "I think she had dark hair."

"Was she white? Black? Green?"

"White."

"Eye color?"

"She had on sunglasses. Maybe a hat?" Will didn't know if his brain was filling in blanks or not. "I don't know what she was wearing. I didn't see any tattoos or birthmarks. I think the car's interior was black. I don't know anything else. I was looking for the girl, and she wasn't there. That's all that mattered at that point."

Amanda seldom cursed, but she did now, saying, "Dammit, these people have been one step ahead of us all day."

Vanessa Livingston came out of the Cold Room. She said, "The camera loses the Prius once it turns out of the breezeway. It's picked up again on the merge. Whoever the driver was, she beat the shutdown by about two minutes. The Prius went 75 North, but that's all we know."

"Did you get the license plate?"

"Partial. Mud covered all but two numbers—three and nine, nonsequential. We're running it through the system. There are eleven hundred Priuses in the metro area. Half of them are silver. It's a popular color. We're drilling them down to the number registered to women so we have a starting point."

"Great," Amanda said. "Like we don't have enough walls to bang our heads against."

Will asked, "Did any of the cameras catch her face? Maybe we can compare it to passengers on the Seattle plane."

"No," Vanessa answered. "If she'd gone into one of the parking decks, or used the upper floor, that would be a different matter."

Will said, "What if it's Eleanor Fielding?"

Instead of shooting him down, Amanda said, "Go on."

"Her Mercedes left the airport. Maybe she looped back around, parked the Mercedes in a different lot, picked up the Prius, and came back to pick up the girl." Will remembered Jenner looking over his shoulder as he walked up the breezeway. The man was looking at oncoming traffic.

Amanda said, "Jenner could hand off the girl downstairs, change into his outfit, then—"

Will finished for her, "Walk back upstairs, go into the main terminal, then take a taxi home."

"Covers them both," Vanessa said. "Except for Will spotting them, we wouldn't even know it had happened."

Amanda looked at her watch. "Will, it's time for you to go back in with Jenner. Add another half hour to your watch."

Will didn't immediately follow orders. "That's a big leap."

"Do as I say," she told him. "It might be the difference between finding the girl and finding her body."

Will sat across the table from Jenner with his hands clasped in front of him. His watch was on full display, the hands set ahead by an hour and twenty minutes. It was a big jump, but Jenner had been in the room for almost four hours. He'd spent most of the time either staring blankly at the two-way mirror or napping. There were no magazines. No TV. No distractions. His sense of time would be infinite.

At least they hoped it would be.

Will looked at his watch. He knew that Jenner hadn't had lunch. "It's way past dinnertime."

Jenner shrugged.

"I can get you a hot dog, chicken sandwich."

Jenner didn't answer. He was turned sideways in his chair. One leg was crossed over the other. Jenner's mouth had stopped bleeding, but he looked bad. Bruises were starting to form around his eyes and nose where his face had met concrete. Dried blood speckled his chin. A crease was down the side of his face where he'd fallen asleep with his cheek on his arm.

He didn't seem scared or anxious. If anything, he seemed bored.

Will forced out a heavy sigh. He sat back in his chair. "You wanna know why I was in the bathroom?"

Jenner's chin lifted. He gazed at Will out of the corner of his eye.

"It's part of a sting operation to catch men cruising for sex."

Jenner snorted a laugh, then seemed to think better of it when the pain shot through his busted nose. "I suppose the police don't have anything better to do."

Will ignored the observation. "I arrested a minister last week."

"Hm," Jenner said.

Will didn't add how awful he'd felt parading the man out in handcuffs. There was a reason Amanda had assigned the job as a punishment. Every day, Will felt like he needed to go home and scrape the filth off of him.

Then again, it was nothing compared to how disgusting he felt sitting across from the likes of Joe Jenner.

Will said, "You really should make a deal."

Jenner cleared his throat. "I've advised my client that it's best not to take legal counsel from the man who's trying to send him to prison."

"You were so easy to track." Will amended, "Your client was, I mean."

Jenner rolled his eyes at the game.

"And the hand-off in the parking lot. Pretty smooth. You know we found your disguise."

Jenner didn't move, which was evidence enough that Will had hit on something.

Will tried another lie. "Eleanor told us where it was. We've got her in the other room."

Jenner pursed his lips.

Will said, "My boss is talking to her right now."

"Is that so." Not a question, but Will could tell that Jenner wasn't so sure of himself now.

"You're a lawyer, Joe. You know that the first person who makes the deal always serves the least amount of time." He pressed a little harder. "Eleanor's already served time. She knows the system. She's going to flip on you. You know that. It's just a matter of time."

"Time?" Jenner looked down at Will's watch, then back at the two-way mirror. "I have plenty of time."

"Is that right?"

"I'm not talking to you anymore."

"Ever? Or just for now?"

Jenner's eyes met his, then went back to the mirror. Will had no idea who was behind the glass. They'd been playing this cat-and-mouse game for a while now. It was tantamount to watching paint dry.

Jenner cleared his throat. He crossed his other leg over his knee. His fingers tapped the table.

Will stared at the man. On the surface, he seemed as normal as any other fifty-year-old. Gray hair. A bit of a paunch in the stomach. Some wattle around the chin. That was the thing about these monsters—they looked just like everybody else. They took jobs that brought them into contact with kids. They developed covers that helped them elude capture. They spent every day of their lives working to bury their tracks, which was why it took so long to unravel the truth when you finally caught them.

Joe Jenner was a pro. He'd worked all of this out ahead of time, exploring the angles, running through the various scenarios. He wasn't alone in this. He had a team. Maybe it was just Eleanor Fielding. Maybe it was more. Whatever their numbers, these people were sophisticated. Coordinated. They hadn't just started doing this on a whim. They had a well-timed plan. They had a backup plan. They had accounted for every variable except for Will being in that bathroom.

And that still might not stop them.

Was that why Jenner seemed so smug? You didn't get to live in the Ritz-Carlton and drive a Bentley by being unsure of yourself, but the man seemed to have a preternatural sense of superiority.

And why wouldn't he? Eleanor Fielding's name was on everything—the flights, the hotel room. She was the one who boarded the flight with Abigail in her arms. There was grainy footage of Jenner with the girl, but he could argue against that. Then there was the fact that Will had jumped him in the parking lot. Jenner's lawyer could easily claim that the police were conspiring to protect their own.

All they had was Will's testimony and some grainy footage. Jenner hadn't harmed the girl—at least not that anyone could say. He'd taken her hand when she got off the plane, led her to the bathroom, then led her to the parking lot. With a sympathetic jury, he might get two or three years. If they never found Abigail—never found the body—he might get less than that.

But then there was the question of time.

Jenner was obviously waiting something out. Was Jenner waiting until he was certain his accomplice had driven Abigail across state lines? Or was the man letting another abuser have his fun while Jenner ran out the clock?

There was a knock on the door that startled both of them.

Faith motioned Will out of the room.

"They found the mother," she said, walking down the hall. "Rebecca Brannon. Lives just outside of Post Falls, Idaho. Father was KIA in Iraq five years ago. Girl's name is Abigail Brannon. Seven years old."

A uniformed patrolman buzzed them into the Cold Room. The main monitor showed a television feed from CNN. A woman with blonde hair and pale white skin stood in front of a bank of microphones with various news logos on them. Both of her eyes were black. Her lip was busted open.

Will blurred his eyes, saw past the damage to the woman's face. He'd been right about one thing, at least. Abigail looked like her mother.

Faith explained, "The mom was beaten and tied up in her basement for two days. Said the attacker was wearing a mask, didn't talk, didn't do anything but knock her out and take the kid. Her boyfriend found her when he got home from a business trip this afternoon."

"Business trip?" Will asked.

"His name's Paul Riggins. He services medical equipment for operating rooms," Faith said. "Most of his business is in Seattle."

"Seattle," Will repeated.

"Riggins drove over to Seattle yesterday morning, came back today. We tracked him through his credit cards. You wanna guess the name of the hotel where he stayed last night?"

Will slowly turned to Faith. "The Hilton Seattle Airport and Conference Center?"

"It gets better: They searched his car. Found thirty thousand dollars in cash underneath the spare tire. All of it in crisp, new hundred-dollar bills."

"New?" Will saw where this was going. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing distributed paper money in blocks that could be tracked through their serial numbers. "Tell me."

Faith could barely contain her excitement. "All of the bills were distributed to the Sixth District."

Will felt a matching grin on his face. The Sixth District of the Federal Reserve Bank provided paper money to Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and parts of Louisiana and Tennessee. He asked, "When were the bills released into circulation?"

"Last week."

"Not enough time to make their way to Seattle."

"Not even close." She added, "And even if there was enough time, there's no way all the bills would be from the same block from the same district by the time they made it to the opposite corner of the country."

Will felt some of the pressure lifting off his chest. Given a little more time, Faith would be able to trace the bills back to a particular bank. If that bank had Joe Jenner as a client, the right kind of judge could be persuaded to sign off on a warrant to search Jenner's accounts. Even the best defense lawyer in the world would have a hard time rebutting testimony from the chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta. This was exactly the kind of evidence that juries loved to hear.

Will asked, "Is Riggins talking?"

"No. He lawyered up."

"Please tell me the Idaho cops got a warrant before they searched his car."

"Didn't have to," Faith said. "Paul Riggins is a registered sex offender."

Will mumbled a curse. "Did the mom know that?"

"No." Faith looked back at the monitor. Rebecca Brannon was sobbing into the microphones, begging for her daughter back. "But she does now."

Yet again, Will sat across from Joe Jenner. He kept his arms crossed, hiding his watch. They were two hours over the correct time now. It was a huge jump, but Jenner had been in the bare interrogation room for so long they were praying that it didn't matter. For Will's part, today already felt like one of the longest of his life.

Jenner finally let out a long, bored sigh. "Well?"

Will told him, "The district attorney for the City of Atlanta is waiting outside."

Jenner seemed unimpressed.

"She's ready to make a deal with you, Joe. Just tell us where the girl is."

Jenner did not respond.

Will laid out the evidence they had. "We know Paul Riggins took Abigail Brannon from his girlfriend's home yesterday morning. Last night, he delivered Abigail to you and Eleanor Fielding at the Hilton Seattle Airport and Conference Center. You gave Riggins thirty thousand dollars cash for the girl."

"You have no proof of any of this."

"We traced the serial numbers, Joe. You should never use new money for this kind of thing."

"I have no idea what you're talking about."

Will laid out what Faith had told him a few moments ago. "The Federal Reserve in Atlanta sent a batch of new hundred-dollar bills to Bank of America's central distribution center. From there, the bank sent it out to their branches. It's money, so they're careful with it. They track the serial numbers. They know where every bill is from the second it enters the system to the second it leaves. Which is why we know that the cash you gave Paul Riggins was withdrawn from three different Bank of America branches: Buckhead, Ansley, and Peachtree Battle." Will crossed his arms over his chest. "We got a judge to let us peek at your accounts. Last week, you withdrew ten thousand dollars from three different accounts at three different branches: Buckhead, Ansley, and Peachtree Battle."

For just a second, Jenner looked surprised. "You can't prove it's all the same."

"Can't we?" Will had to resist the smile that wanted to come. He liked hearing the panic in Jenner's voice, no matter how quickly it dissipated.

"I was robbed."

Will asked, "Did you file a report?"

"I didn't have time."

"You just let thirty thousand dollars walk off?" Will shook his head. "Why'd you have it in the first place?"

"I don't believe that's anyone's business."

"Be sure to tell that to the jury," Will advised. "I guess you thought you were being smart by limiting each withdrawal to ten grand. Being a tax lawyer, you know that the bank is required to report any transactions over ten thousand dollars. And, of course, on internal flights, the TSA can't legally limit how much cash you travel with."

Jenner brushed some invisible lint off the sleeve of his jacket.

"Eleanor Fielding carried Abigail onto the plane. The girl was drugged. I imagine Paul Riggins has access to sedatives, seeing as he's in and out of hospitals all day. Abigail slept the whole flight. You were two seats back, but you kept an eye on her the entire time, drinking coffee so you'd stay awake." Will paused, making sure Jenner had time to absorb every word. "You took Abigail off the plane. You had it timed just right until Abigail had to go to the bathroom."

Jenner's mouth opened. Will was certain he was going to make a snide comment about small bladders, but he changed his mind.

Will continued, "Eleanor picked up her Mercedes at the North Terminal deck, then looped back around to the South Terminal, where she traded it for the Prius." This had been the final piece of the puzzle. A quick search through records had located the Mercedes just where Will assumed it would be. "Meanwhile, you took Abigail out of the airport through the underground breezeway. You were supposed to hand her off there, but you saw me and panicked."

Jenner's eyebrow went up. He obviously didn't care for the description.

"You had to improvise. You ran into the garage, hid behind some cars until I was looking the other way, then handed off Abigail at the top of the ramp. I couldn't hear the engine because the Prius was going too slow."

Jenner waited.

"That's where we found your wig and glasses. You changed your appearance in the hopes that you'd be able to walk back into the airport, grab a cab, and go to the next meeting point." Will leaned forward, crowding the space between them. "You can help yourself out of this."

Jenner remained silent.

"Tell us where she is, Joe. That's the only way you avoid serious jail time."

Still, Jenner kept quiet.

"It'll be easier for you if we find her alive," Will said, hoping to appeal to the man's self-interests. "If she's dead, and the coroner shows pictures of her body, tells the jury what she's been through..." Will braced himself for the awful things he had to say. "They'll show the bruises on her wrist where you grabbed her. It'll match the film of you dragging her through the concourse. They'll show the bruise on her knee where she stumbled in the tunnel. The film will back that up. They'll show her shoe. Her missing shoe." Will took the little slipper out of his pocket. He threw it on the table between them. "The jury will see the film of you jerking her up when she reached back for her shoe. Maybe the coroner will have slides that show the damage to her arm muscles where you wrenched it."

Jenner was looking down again, but his eyes were not on the shoe. They were on Will's watch. Will followed his gaze as the big hand moved to the seven.

Jenner flashed a self-satisfied smile. He said, "I want it in writing."

Will was so shocked that it was finally the appointed hour that he almost didn't know how to respond.

Jenner said, "I'll tell you where the girl is being held, but I'm not going to jail." He added, "And I'm not going on the registered sex offenders list."

"You know you can't avoid jail time."

"I can avoid anything I like if you want to find the girl alive. Get the DA in here." His eyes flashed toward the door. "I'd hurry if I were you. Tick-tock."

Will stood from the table. Instead of leaving, he waited for the door to open. It was quite a crowd for the small room: Anna Ward, the Atlanta district attorney; Vanessa Livingston; and Amanda Wagner.

Jenner held up his handcuffed wrists, telling Will, "Get these things off me."

Will fished into his pocket for the key. He took off the cuffs as Amanda shut the door.

"Mr. Jenner." Anna smoothed her skirt as she sat down at the table. She placed a digital recorder beside a closed file folder. A click of a button turned on the red recording light. "I'm Anna Ward, the city's attorney. I want to advise you that I'm recording this conversation. Can you please confirm for the tape that you've been read and understand your rights?"

Jenner rolled his eyes. "Yes, I've been advised of my rights. Yes, I am aware that this is being recorded. Yes, I'm aware that this is being watched through that ridiculous mirror on the wall."

"Thank you." She opened the folder, ignoring his sarcastic tone. "I hope you don't mind if I skip the rest of the introductions. As you know, we don't have much time."

Jenner smiled, showing his broken teeth. "On the contrary. I have all the time in the world."

Anna passed him the first document from the folder. The red, gold, and black seal of the Atlanta Police Department was in the top corner. "This authorizes your immediate release from the Atlanta Police's Airport Precinct and guarantees that the department will not pursue any charges against you in this matter. It is signed by Commander Vanessa Livingston here at the bottom." She turned to the next page. "This states that the City of Atlanta will not require you to register on the sex offenders list and that we will not pursue any further charges against you for the abduction, transportation, trafficking, or any other crime related to the minor known as Abigail Brannon." She turned to the last page. "This specifies that the deal is strictly contingent upon you directing us to the exact location of the girl."

"I can only tell you where she was taken."

"We understand that, Mr. Jenner. If you refer to this line"—she touched her finger to the appropriate words—"you'll see that your only requirement in honoring this agreement is to tell the truth about everything you know. If at any time you lie or evade questioning, or any information you give is found to be untrue, this agreement is void and you are subject to full prosecution." She took a pen out of her jacket pocket and handed it to Jenner.

"Let's not get ahead of ourselves," Jenner said. He took his time reading the documents. His eyes scanned back and forth along each line of each page. Will looked down at his watch. Five minutes passed before Jenner was certain he'd seen every possible loophole or trick in the one-page agreement.

"Okay," he said, taking the pen. He signed each page, then handed the sheets back to Anna. She signed and initialed everything.

Amanda said, "Mr. Jenner, where is the girl?"

He pursed his lips, clearly enjoying the tension. "She's being held at the Lakewood Arms Hotel. Room 215.” Less than ten miles away.

“Go!” Vanessa yelled, tapping the two-way mirror, though Will was certain her team was already heading to the hotel.

“So.” Jenner took the documents and folded them in two. “I suppose I should get out of your hair.”

“Did you touch her?” Will asked.

Jenner’s eyes went to Anna Ward. She told him, “You’re required to tell the truth, Mr. Jenner. That’s the agreement.”

“No,” he admitted. “Unfortunately.”

Will’s body tensed. Except for Amanda’s calming hand on his shoulder, he would’ve pounded the guy into the floor again.

“I think we’re done here.” Jenner tucked the documents into his jacket pocket and stood from the table. “When are you people going to realize you’re not smart enough to play these games?”

“Thirty thousand dollars,” Will said. “That’s all a child’s life is worth?”

Jenner looked at Anna Ward again. “The truth, right?”

She had to clear her throat before she could speak. “Yes.”

“I think that’s a fair sum when you factor in transportation and accommodations.” He gave a pleased sigh. “I know the Lakewood Arms doesn’t sound like much, but I had such a lovely night planned for our first date.”

Will’s fists clenched. “You bastard.”

Jenner had that familiar snarky grin on his face. “I’d hurry out to Lakewood, Officers. Eleanor was expecting me an hour ago. I’m sure she’s halfway to Florida by now.” He headed toward the door. There was something like a spring in his step. “Florida. That sounds like a nice place for a first date, doesn’t it?” He put his hand on the doorknob.

Amanda asked, “Where do you think you’re going?”

“Home,” he said. “It’s been a long day.”

“Be that as it may—” Amanda reached past Jenner and opened the door. An imposing man in a sheriff’s uniform blocked the exit—literally; he was as big as a refrigerator.

Amanda made the introductions. “Mr. Jenner, this is Phil Peterson, the sheriff for Clayton County. You can’t see behind him, but the Fulton sheriff and the FBI would like a word, too.”

“The—” Jenner pulled the documents out of his pocket. “I have your word that—”

“Mr. Jenner.” Vanessa Livingston did the honors. “Perhaps as a tax lawyer you’re familiar with the competing interests of various jurisdictions?” She paused, as if she expected an answer. “The airport compound reaches into the unincorporated regions of two counties and three cities.” She paused for effect, pointing at the floor. “You’re currently in the city of Atlanta. As the commander of this zone, I’ve ordered your release. You have my signature on that paperwork. I’ll do nothing to stop you from leaving.”

Anna Ward added, “Nor will I. The City of Atlanta will honor its agreement. We will not pursue charges against you.”

Jenner’s tone had a decidedly higher pitch. “I don’t understand.”

Vanessa explained, “The C concourse is in Hapeville, which is inside Fulton County. Your time in the underground train took you through the unincorporated parts of Clayton County. Your jaunt through the South Terminal breezeway was in College Park, which, again, is within the Fulton County limits. Sheriff Peterson won the coin toss, so he gets first crack at charging you.”

Amanda picked up from there. “The Georgia Bureau of Investigation would also like to talk to you regarding your transportation of a child across county lines.” She added, “And, of course, since you traveled across state lines—many state lines—that puts you directly in the crosshairs of the FBI.” She mimicked Jenner’s snarky smile to perfection. “I trust you understand what I’m saying, Mr. Jenner. It’s always refreshing to talk to someone with a brain in her head.” She corrected, “His head.”

Sheriff Phil Peterson took out his handcuffs. He was almost a foot taller than Jenner and twice as wide. His deep baritone rumbled in Will’s eardrums as he told Joe Jenner, “Turn around, little man. I’m gonna let you see what it feels like to be dragged through the airport.”

seven

Will paced underneath the gates at the E concourse. There was a small waiting area inside, but he was too anxious to be confined. Even the wide-open space of the great outdoors wasn't enough.

He just wanted it over. He wanted Abigail with her mom. He wanted the bad guys in jail. He wanted to go home to his girlfriend and spend the rest of the night listening to the soothing cadence of her heartbeat.

Will stopped his pacing as a plane touched down. He watched it taxi down the runway, then turn toward one of the other terminals. He resumed pacing, thinking about all the people above him who were oblivious to what had happened today. It amazed him that the world was still spinning on its axis. Wide-body jets were parked nose-in to the gates, lining up like soldiers for international flights. Jetways were locked in. Catering trucks were extended on scissor lifts. Suitcases loaded. Flight attendants got on board. Occasionally, a pilot would walk out, examining every inch of the plane as part of the preflight safety inspection.

It was as if nothing had happened.

Will looked at his watch, feeling a moment of panic before he realized he hadn't bothered to set it back.

Abigail Brannon was safe. That was all that mattered right now. Faith had called from the hospital to let Will know that the little girl had checked out fine. A few scrapes and bruises were the only physical injuries she'd suffered.

The same could not be said of Eleanor Fielding, who'd had the bad sense to try to evade arrest. A battalion of cops had chased her through the Lakewood Arms. She'd finally climbed on the balcony and threatened to jump. When no one seemed interested in stopping her, she'd followed through on her promise. Unfortunately, the woman had survived the three-story fall. Her busted pelvis and legs would mend, but she'd spend the rest of her life in prison.

Just like Joe Jenner.

Will had to smile every time he thought about the shocked look on the man's face. It was always the smart ones who ended up tying their own nooses.

The doors slid open. A ground-crew worker came out. His orange vest hung loose around his waist. He gave Will a nod and headed toward the men waiting for the next landing so they could collect baggage off the plane.

Will couldn't pace anymore. He leaned against the wall. His back ached. His head was pounding. He was pretty sure he was getting lung cancer from the constant odor of jet fuel.

He was punch-drunk from exhaustion. And anxiety. And relief.

He took Abigail Brannon's slipper out of his pocket. He'd found some glue to fix the trim. He'd taken the other shoe out of evidence. He'd give them to Faith. He doubted Abigail Brannon would want to see him. She'd seen Will twice—in the bathroom and on the train. Both times she'd looked at him with longing in her eyes, begging to be rescued. Both times, Will had failed her.

At least she'd be in her mother's arms soon. Will would have to stop calling New Age believers freaks after this. He had visualized Abigail Brannon in her mother's arms, and that was exactly what was about to happen.

A wealthy Idaho farmer had donated the use of his private jet so that Rebecca Brannon could fly straight to Atlanta to meet her daughter. The charter pilot had been given special permission to divert to the E concourse so that the press couldn't bother them.

Will could only imagine what was going through the woman's mind right now. The flight was over four hours long. That was a lot of time to think about the fact that Paul Riggins, the man she'd been dating, had sold her daughter to a ring of pedophiles. He would probably spend the next ten years in prison.

Ten years.

That seemed light to Will. None of these bastards ever got what they really deserved. It was the one instance where Will was one hundred percent in favor of the death penalty. He'd advocate bringing back a firing squad if it meant he'd be the one to take out Joe Jenner.

The man was already working the angles. He'd hired one of the top lawyers in the state. He'd probably end up with five years. The rumors about what happened to pedophiles in prison were true, but still that was not enough to satisfy Will's desire for the man to be punished.

The doors slid open again. Amanda and Vanessa Livingston were shoulder to shoulder, talking in low voices. They'd worked together longer than Will had been alive. The women shared a bond in the way of soldiers who've been bloodied in the same battles.

Vanessa held a police radio in her hand. It squawked as soon as the doors closed. She put her ear to the speaker, nodding as if the person on the other side could see her. Finally, she told Will, "The plane just landed. Faith's on her way down with the girl. We've had some more enterprising reporters who booked flights so they can get into the terminal."

Amanda added, "Rumor has it they'll be at the T concourse."

Vanessa grinned. "I wonder who told them that?" She winked at Will as she walked over to the ground crew.

Amanda stayed with Will. They watched a small jet plane make the turn toward the gates. There was a large green logo on the side. Will couldn't make out the words, but he guessed from the yellow stalk of corn in the middle that this was the wealthy Idaho farmer's plane.

Amanda said, "And people say the one percent don't do their share."

Will wasn't in the mood to joke. He wasn't going to be able to breathe again until Abigail and Rebecca Brannon were together.

The engine roared as the jet turned toward them, nose pointing at Will's chest. The plane idled for a second, then inched forward, stopping a few yards away. The engine wound down. One of the ground crew rolled out a blue carpet. The door was twisted open. A set of stairs came out like a tongue.

The pilot got off first, then an older man, probably a grandparent. He was leaning on a cane. The pilot held out a hand to help him down. Once the old man was on the tarmac, he turned around and held out his hand for the next passenger.

Will recognized Rebecca Brannon from her news conference. She looked even more frail in person. Her eyes were almost black. Her nose had been broken, as had her ankle. She handed down her crutch. Both men had to help her hop down the stairs.

Amanda told Will, "It's a good outcome."

"It should've never happened in the first place."

"Take the win, Will. Cases like this, that doesn't usually happen."

Vanessa had her radio to her ear again. She jogged ahead of the Brannons, handing Will her keycard. She told him, "Run to the top of the stairs to let Faith in. I don't think the mother can make it up."

Will didn't feel like the right person for the job, but he was too tired to argue. He went back into the building, taking a moment to get his bearings. The labyrinthine underbelly of the airport was more confusing than anything the public ever saw. Will found the metal stairs outside a propped-open fire door. He took them two at a time, his shoes thumping on the steel. At the top, he saw a closed door with a narrow window. Faith was looking down at him. There was a worried expression on her face.

She stepped back so that Will could open the door.

He stood on the top stair, unable to move. He'd been hoping that the girl was too exhausted to remember him. He'd been praying she was too focused on seeing her mom to stare at him with those same sad eyes he'd seen so many hours ago.

But Abigail Brannon was none of those things. Her eyes were trained down at the floor. She was quiet. Too quiet.

Will looked at Faith.

She explained, "They gave her something to help calm her down."

Will knelt down on the top stair so that he could look at the girl. He told her, "Your mom's downstairs waiting for you."

She didn't move—didn't appear to want to see her mother, or anyone else.

Faith asked, "Sweetheart, don't you want to see your mom?"

Abigail's small shoulder went up in a shrug. Her eyes were glazed over. Her face remained emotionless. She was dressed in a long T-shirt that fell past her knees. Faith had obviously bought it at the hospital gift shop. The creases were still in the material where it had been folded up in the package. A pair of blue hospital sandals were on her feet. The label was still attached. Her toes didn't even show. They were meant for a small adult, not a little girl.

Will took Abigail's shoes out of his pocket. There was a tiny flash of recognition in the girl's eyes. Wordlessly, she put her hand on Will's shoulder, kicking off a sandal, lifting her bare foot. He slid on the Hello Kitty shoe. She changed hands, lifted the other foot. He had to use his finger to help her heel slide in. Too much glue had made the back stiff.

He asked, "Ready?"

She didn't answer. Will finally made himself look her in the eye. He braced himself for that same sad expression, the one that cut straight through to his heart. Instead, he saw wonder.

"I saw you," she whispered. "I saw you from before."

Will felt a lump sticking in his throat. This time, he was the one who couldn't speak. He could only manage a nod.

"I saw you in the bathroom and I saw you on the train."

Will had to force himself to answer. "Yes," he agreed. "You did."

Her eyes started to water. He thought that she was going to cry, but a smile slowly spread across her face. "I knew you would save me," she told Will. "I saw you seeing me, and I knew that you would save me."

Will breathed out. He didn't realize until that moment that he'd been holding his breath.

"I knew it," Abigail repeated. "I just knew."

She threw her arms around Will's shoulders. He gently returned the hug. He could feel her bony elbows and wrists as he lifted Abigail up and carried her down the steps to her mother.

And for an extra thrill,
read on for the short story

BUSTED

BUSTED

1.

Will Trent let out a long, mournful sigh as he stared at the blinking red light on the frozen Coke machine. There was no telling how long the Coke and ice had to cycle before a delicious frozen beverage came out. Will had an app on his phone that showed the location of every Icee machine in Georgia. This was the twenty-first century. It was bad enough they weren't flying around in jetpacks. Was it too much to expect a real-time update on a frozen Coke?

He glanced around the Lil' Dixie Gas-n-Go, taking in the neon signs that advertised live bait, ammo, and lottery tickets. Will was in Forest Park, less than half an hour's drive from downtown Atlanta, but the gas station had all the makings of a country store. Day-old biscuits baked under a heat lamp. A gallon jar of pickled pigs' feet sat next to the cash register. A plexiglass display for smokeless tobacco filled an entire wall. Except for the frozen Coke, Will was hard-pressed to come up with a reason anybody would want to be here.

He wasn't just thinking about the store. Forest Park was a dog of a city, sitting on the edge of Clayton County, which was arguably one of the worst counties in the state. The usual suspects had led to its demise—bad real estate deals, corrupt county officials, the shuttering of a major military base—but the final nail in the coffin had been the 1996 Olympics. In the name of progress, Atlanta had razed all of its government housing projects and sent the occupants south so that international guests and athletes wouldn't have to gaze upon the poor and disenfranchised.

After the Games were gone, no one was asked to return. For Atlanta, out of sight meant out of mind or, in the case of the thousands who were forcibly relocated, out of luck. Very little monies or resources were spent on helping them settle. Gang members set up shop. Crime rates soared. Neighborhoods were decimated as anyone who could afford to fled to other counties. The pillaging didn't stop with the usual bad guys. In the intervening years, rampant corruption and mismanagement had touched just about every governing body. The Clayton County school system had lost its national accreditation. The county chief of police was being investigated by the state for theft of grant money. A commissioner had been billed by one local paper as "often investigated, never indicted." The county's finance office and archives had been served with enough search warrants to wallpaper the governor's mansion.

And none of that accounted for the glaring injustice of the slow-moving wheels in the Lil' Dixie frozen Coke machine.

Will took his cell phone out of his pocket and checked the time. He'd wasted six minutes waiting for the machine to cycle. He already knew he was an idiot for waiting so long. The question was, would he be a bigger idiot if he cut his losses and left?

Five more minutes.

He tucked the phone back into his pocket and walked up the aisle. The girl behind the register eyed him suspiciously. She had good reason to. Will usually wore a three-piece suit to work, an outfit he'd been told made him look more like an undertaker than an agent with the Georgia Bureau of Investigation, which he'd been for over a decade. Today was his first day undercover for a new assignment. He was wearing shitkicker boots, torn jeans, and a flannel shirt that was too tight across his shoulders. The only thing missing from his con attire was a tattoo, but there were some sacrifices Will was not willing to make.

He had always liked working undercover, liked the idea of being a different person, walking around in a different skin. Of course, that was before he'd met Sara Linton. The prospect of being someone else had lost some of its appeal now that he had a steady girlfriend. Will liked exactly who he was right now. He liked the man he saw reflected in Sara's eyes. He especially liked the way she'd woken him up with her mouth this morning, which was exactly how Will wanted to wake up every day for the rest of his life.

The bell over the door clanged. A fireplug of a cop sauntered into the store, his eyes scanning back and forth like a gun turret.

The man's leather belt creaked as he walked, his gun, mace, baton, and handcuffs beating their own symphony against his body. His black shoes snicked on the floor. His dark blue uniform with its yellow stripe appeared to be from the bumblebee line of law enforcement attire. The pants were ironed into a sharp crease. The Forest Park Police Department badge on his chest was shined to a mirror polish.

Will knew the guy's type without even thinking about it—the way he swiveled his sunglasses around to the back of his head, the bulging arms that were more fat than muscle, the air of Axe body wash that chewed into the oxygen around him. He was the type of hard-ass who would play fair so long as you understood that he was in charge. The minute he thought otherwise, you'd hear the hounds of hell barking in your ears.

Today must've been a good day. The cop winked at the girl behind the counter as he grabbed the key to the bathroom. He'd clocked Will the minute he'd walked through the door, but he pretended like he hadn't right up until it was time to pass by. Will narrowed his eyes, mindful that he was undercover. His fake identity had him as a con named Bill Black, and there wasn't a con on earth who didn't hate the sight of a cop. If not for a sense of decorum, Will would've spit on the floor.

The cop looked up at Will, his neck cracking because Will had a good ten inches on him. "That your bike out there?"

Will didn't answer. The Indian Chief Dark Horse came courtesy of the Fulton County impound lot. The motorcycle's warbonnet headaddress tank design and black matte spoke wheels had cost a high-rolling drug dealer a chunk of change. It gave Will some pleasure knowing the high roller was currently serving ten to fifteen in Valdosta State Prison while his shit-hot bike was parked in front of the Lil' Dixie. The license plate was registered to Bill Black. The cop would've pulled up Black's sheet on his computer before he entered the store. Assault. Battery. Attempted robbery. Suspected in a string of crimes from here to Kentucky. And perhaps most heinous of all—speeding in a school zone.

The cop asked, "I need to worry about you, hoss?"

Will guessed Bill Black wouldn't have much to say to a cop. He would also know it was perfectly legal to remain silent. Instead of answering, Will looked at the magazines on the rack. Porn, mostly, and People magazine, which was basically porn for women.

“All right,” the cop said. “If that’s how you wanna play it.” He glared another second or two before heading off toward the bathroom.

Will checked the girl at the counter again. She had seen the exchange and was looking at him differently now. Very early on in his life, Will had learned that there was a certain kind of woman who was attracted to trouble. He guessed the girl behind the counter was this kind of woman. At least it seemed like it when she took out her lip gloss and seductively traced the wand around her wet lips.

Which made Will think of Sara this morning.

Which made him think he needed something to distract himself.

He made sure the Icee machine’s light was still flashing, then randomly picked up one of the magazines. The paper was thin, and he realized he’d chosen Busted, a weekly newspaper that compiled all the mugshots taken by the local police. It was like a celebration of incarceration, with centerfolds, ads for bail bondsmen, and explanations for the alphabet of charges: DUI, PUI, PMDD, DGCSA.

Obviously, some arrestees had cottoned to the fact that their mugshots might be viewed by a wider audience. The centerfold for this particular issue was a female meth freak with her head thrown back so the camera could better capture her toothless grin. Underneath her face was a smattering of capital letters that Will didn’t bother to decipher.

He returned the paper to the rack and headed toward the back of the store. The flashing red light was flashing at a slower pace. Will wondered if that meant the mixture was close to ready, or if he was trapped in some sort of Icee-fugue state where time had ceased to matter.

He thought to ask the girl, but she had stopped making googly eyes at him and was staring blankly at the wall. Her body was draped across the counter in a visual display of boredom. Will guessed she hadn’t noticed that a truck had pulled up outside. It was an older model Chevy with nothing but Bondo and a spotty primer coat holding it together—the kind you saw in the movies that indicated the guy who drove it was either an old-timer who smoked a pipe or a young man who had resisted the call of the city and was choosing to work the land.

The truck idled. Smoke curled from its tailpipe. There was a man behind the wheel, but he didn't get out.

The bathroom door slammed open. Will had to breathe through his mouth. Axe body wash was no longer the predominant odor. The cop tossed the bathroom key up and down in his hand, calling to the girl, "You might not wanna go in there for a few." He was smiling when he looked at Will, but there was a warning in his eyes. Will held contact for a few seconds longer than necessary before turning back to the Icee machine.

The red light was off.

Will tried to pretend that his heart hadn't just skipped a beat. The idling truck was a distant memory; let the cop deal with it. Will was a con named Bill Black who liked to partake of the occasional frozen drink.

He grabbed a cup and snapped on a plastic dome. He lined up the hole in the dome with the spout for the machine. He wrapped his fingers around the handle, pausing a split second before pulling back and allowing the rush of frozen Coke to fill the cup.

And then something odd happened.

The cup was on the floor. The plastic dome topped a pile of frozen Coke like something out of a Stephen King novel. Will's hand was empty, but his fingers were still curved like he was gripping the cup. His other hand held open the nozzle. A slush pile slopped over the tip of his boot. There was a high-pitched whine, then a sharp pain like a needle piercing his eardrum.

His brain quickly went into rewind. Somewhere in his visual cortex, Will saw the cup lift off the floor, the frozen drink slush back in, the dome snap back onto the top. At the end, Will was holding the cup again, about to pull back on the handle.

That was when he'd first heard the gunshot. It was an explosion that shook the air like a rocket taking off.

Two seconds had passed, tops, but it felt like minutes.

Will's knee went to the floor—automatic, just like he'd been trained. Get yourself low and little. His hand went to his side, but of course his gun wasn't there. He was undercover. Cons weren't allowed to carry weapons, and Bill Black was a law-abiding con.

"Give me the fucking money!" a man screamed. His voice trilled up, like he was more scared than anybody else. "Hurry!"

Cautiously, Will peered around the row of magazines. The girl was shoving money into a plastic bag as quickly as she could. The offending weapon was pointed at her head. Shotgun. Winchester Model 24, double-barrel, side-by-side boxlock action. The man holding it was African American, maybe forty, forty-five years old, roughly five-eight and 180 pounds. He had a bushy porn mustache and a spotty goatee. He looked straggly, more homeless guy than holdup man. He was wearing dirty jeans and a matching denim jacket with dark stains on the sleeves. Dreadlocks stuck out from underneath a John Deere baseball cap.

Will took out his cell phone. He dialed 911.

"All of it!" the gunman screamed. The tip of the shotgun wavered from his shaking hands. "Hurry!"

Will pressed the cell phone to his ear, willing the operator to pick up. He looked for the cop. The man was on the floor. His Glock was inches from his fingers. He'd obviously tried to draw down on the robber and gotten a bullet for his effort. Blood pooled around him. His sunglasses had skidded across the floor. One of the lenses was broken in two. The gunman's heel crunched on the plastic as he stepped back. Sixth sense. He was wondering who else was in the store.

Will heard a loud click in his ear. The emergency operator sounded as bored as they usually did. "Nine-one-one. What's your —"

"Who's there?" the gunman yelled. He turned toward the back of the store, took one step, then another. "Who is it?"

Will put the cell phone on the floor as he duck-walked toward the next aisle.

"Who are you?" There was something different about the gunman's tone. Will looked up, his eyes finding the fish-eye mirror in the corner. He could see the gunman, which meant the gunman could see him.

Slowly, Will raised his hands. He tried to sound like a con. "I got no beef with you, man."

"I need to worry about you?"

The words were eerily similar to the cop's.

"No." Will glanced down at his phone, hoping like hell the 911 operator was listening. "Lookit, bro, we're cool. You ain't the first guy to rob a gas station."

The shotgun was raised, but the man didn't come closer.

Will pressed his luck. "Don't worry about me. Just take the money, jump back on 75 and get the hell outta here.” Will had to swallow so he could keep talking. “Police ask me, I’ll tell them you took the back roads.”

There was a moment that felt a lot like contemplation. Will didn’t realize he’d been holding his breath until he saw the gunman shake his head once, then turn back to the girl at the cash register.

Apparently, the gunman wasn’t pleased with her lack of progress. “I said hurry, you stupid bitch!”

“I’m doin’ it!” she yelled back. Will chanced another look. She stuffed one last handful of cash into the bag before shoving it toward the robber. “That’s it! That’s all I got!”

The gunman snatched the bag out of the girl’s hand. Relief seemed to flood his body. His teeth showed under the mustache. He gave a rebel yell as he raised the shotgun and pulled back on the trigger, which was a very dramatic way to make an exit, but a stupid thing to do if you wanted to get away.

Double-barrel shotgun. Two triggers. Two shots. Unless he broke the action and reloaded, the gunman might as well be holding a hollow metal stick.

Will stood up.

“Jesus Christ!” the gunman screamed, obviously startled.

Will started walking toward him.

“What are you doing?”

Will told the girl, “Go out the back.”

“I thought we were cool!” the man yelled, his voice cracking. “Stop right there!”

Will didn’t stop.

The man leveled the shotgun from his waist. “I’ll shoot you.”

Will kept walking. The girl was frozen in place, so he made his voice harder. “Move.”

She finally did as she was told, bolting for the back door.

“Stop!” The man shook the gun at Will. “I mean it! Stop!”

Will still didn’t stop.

The gunman pulled on the first trigger, then the second one. The empty clicks reverberated through the store. “Shit!”

Will grabbed the shotgun. The hot barrels singed his skin. He jammed the butt of the gun into the man’s chest so hard that he could feel the sternum give. The man stumbled back against the plate glass window. His arms flew out. His eyes went wide. There was a clinking sound. The glass started to crack, white lines shooting out like bolts of lightning.

The man's forehead broke out in blood—at least that's what it seemed like. Will felt the air stir as a bullet whistled past him. Bone and gray matter spattered his face, the front of his shirt. The gunman had been shot from behind. The bullet went through the glass, through his head, and almost straight into Will.

Instinct.

Will's knee hit the floor. His hands went over his head like they could magically stop a bullet.

The idling Chevy.

The getaway vehicle.

The driver stood outside the open door to the truck. He started shooting wildly into the store. Bullets zinged off the floor, ricocheted into the snack displays.

Will reached for the Glock. The cop's hand snaked out and grabbed it before Will could. Even flat on his back, he wouldn't give up his weapon. Another bullet whizzed past Will's shoulder. There was no time for reasoning. Since Will couldn't grab the Glock, he grabbed the bag of cash. He ran down the aisle, hiding behind the end-cap as linoleum tiles splintered behind him.

Silence descended. Like time, sound was defying the laws of science.

Slowly, Will was able to pick out some familiar noises. The idling engine of the Chevy was like a broom sweeping up asphalt. The heavy, snare drum pounding was his heart trying to break out of his chest. The rat-tat-tat was the breath panting out of his mouth. Will looked down at the bag of cash in his hands like it could explain to Will why he'd grabbed it. And then for no reason at all, he looked back up at the Icee machine.

The red light was flashing again.

Motherfucker.

Glass crunched. The driver was inside the store. Will's eyes automatically locked onto the fish-eye mirror. He could see the second shooter, so the second shooter could also see him.

Everybody wanted to think they were Rambo in a situation like this, but the fact was the only thing going through your mind was that you were probably going to die. Will debated how to go out. Should he throw the bag of cash at the man, hoping that's all he wanted? Should he just stand up and take the bullet to his chest on the off chance that all the major arteries would be missed? Should he just stay curled into a ball and piss himself like every bone in his body was telling him to do?

One single gunshot rang out. Will stood up. This wasn't instinct or training, but just blind hope. The shot was either the cop shooting the driver or the driver shooting the cop. It didn't really matter. This was Will's only chance. He lunged into a full run. He kept his body low like a linebacker going for a tackle. The driver was either distracted or shocked or just plain stupid, because instead of shooting Will in the face, he stood there with his mouth open in surprise until Will's shoulder slammed into his gut.

The force pounded them both into the floor. Will tried to grab onto the man, but he was wiry, and he bucked like a horse. Will got in a few punches before the driver's elbow swung around like a rotary blade. Will's nose exploded. That was the only way to describe it. The pain was debilitating. He saw literal stars. He was too stunned to do anything but bleed, which gave the driver the opportunity to push himself up from the floor. Will struggled to do the same. It was no use. He shook his head like a dog. Horked up a wad of blood from the back of his throat.

The driver ran toward the door. There was a wail of sirens in the distance. Will could see the guy heading for his truck. After a few false starts, Will ran after him. His boots cracked against broken glass. He jumped over the cop's body. The asshole was still holding tight to his Glock. Will didn't bother with the gun. The Chevy was barreling toward the road, which was less than fifty yards from the interstate.

Will jumped on his bike. He kicked the starter and revved the engine. The bike bucked from the sudden surge of power, but Will held on tight, opening the throttle wide as he shot out into the road.

He nearly rammed straight into a Mercedes. Morning rush hour was out in force, cars streaming into the various fast-food restaurants lining the exit. Will darted in and out between cars, narrowing his eyes to keep out the bugs and dirt spitting up from the road. He heard sirens behind him, but knew that his bike was their best chance to keep up with the Chevy. Ahead, the man drove with one foot on the brake, one on the gas. He swung the truck like a slingshot in and out of traffic, blindly trusting that everyone else would get out of his way.

The Chevy ran the first light it came to, causing an eighteen-wheeler to jackknife across the median. Will cringed as the rig swept up two SUVs. Just by chance, he looked down to find the handlebar of his bike inches away from a car's side view mirror. Will jerked his hand away seconds before the grip hit the mirror. The mirror flipped back. He fought to correct the turn, praying he hadn't saved his fingers only to lay down eight miles of skin on blacktop.

The Indian righted, staying true to the yellow line in the center of the road. Will gunned the engine. He clenched his ass cheeks as he slid between two cars going in the opposite direction. The Chevy was up ahead. A Forest Park Police cruiser was on its tail now. Lights and sirens were blaring. Cars were starting to pull over, but not all of them. Will saw a man holding up his iPhone with one hand as he attempted to drive with the other.

The Chevy approached the bridge over the interstate. The driver was going straight as an arrow, but he made a split-second decision and swerved toward the on-ramp to I-75. The police cruiser missed the turn by about a foot, popping against the bridge railing so hard that the trunk and hood flew open. Will almost did the same. He turned at such a steep angle that he felt the asphalt rub the seam on the side of his jeans.

He righted himself, then swerved sharply to avoid rear-ending a parked BMW. Then swerved again to avoid another car. Will gripped the brake as hard as he could. The bike went into a spin, almost getting away from him before shuddering to a stop.

The on-ramp was packed with vehicles. Again, the Chevy weaved back and forth through traffic. The driver's luck ran out smack in the middle of the ramp. The Chevy clipped the front end of a Prius. The impact was like two rubber balls colliding. The Prius sucked into an SUV. The Chevy bounced sideways, sliding at a right angle across the asphalt.

Will stood from the bike.

The on-ramp started at the top of a steep hill. Instead of a guardrail lining the left side, there were a bunch of orange barrels indicating where a guardrail would eventually be placed. The on-ramp needed it. The median was a sharp drop down, maybe thirty feet of nothing but sky between the top of the ramp and the highway. The Chevy driver's hands worked furiously to avoid the obvious, but there was no stopping gravity. The truck knocked out a row of orange barrels as it plunged toward the interstate.

Will felt his jaw drop.

Instead of fighting the fall, the driver steered into it. The truck accelerated. The wheels caught air. The landing wasn't pretty. The truck bounced and skipped across four lanes of interstate, hit the median divider, then skidded back across the same four lanes. Cars careened around like pinballs. The driver's arms flew wide as his head slammed into the roof, then snapped down, then slammed into the roof again.

For just a moment, it looked like the Chevy might tip over, but through some act of physics Will would never understand, the truck stayed upright. The driver didn't argue with luck. The truck's engine screeched as it lurched down the interstate. The tires had popped from the impact. The rubber flew loose like Silly String. The Chevy was on nothing but rims now. Sparks flew up from the road.

Still, he was getting away.

Will sat down on the bike. He pulled back on the throttle again, gunning the engine. The on-ramp was bottlenecked. Some of the drivers had gotten out of their cars to watch the melee. Most of them had phones in their hands, like nothing was real for them unless they captured it on video.

Will had no choice but to follow the truck's path down the median. He tried to control the descent, but a large rock sent the bike airborne. He ended up making roughly the same jump to the interstate as the Chevy. It was easier on the bike, and certainly more graceful, but only a last-minute straightening of his knees kept Will's testicles from sneezing out of his nose.

Up ahead, the Chevy was slowing. The rims had melted down to the axles. Finally, the driver was forced to stop in the middle of the interstate. No one had been speeding, but there were still some collisions as the cars around him came to a stop. In the end, the Chevy looked like the center of a Matchbox display.

Will was around a hundred yards away, the length of a football field, but he clearly saw the driver get out of the truck. A blue bandanna was wrapped around the lower half of the man's face. A gun was in his hand. He stumbled as his leg started to give out from under him. Blood soaked his shirt and pants. He limped across the interstate, the gun pointed straight out in front of him as he approached a yellow Mini Cooper. Will saw the door open. A woman's leg appeared, her high-heeled shoe touching the pavement.

The man waved his gun, indicating she should slide over to the passenger's seat.

Hostage.

Will revved the bike. He didn't let himself think about what he was doing, because what he was doing was probably the most idiotic thing he'd ever done in his life.

He steered straight toward the driver, the muscles in his arm and shoulders screaming from pulling back on the throttle. The driver turned, but it was too late. By the time he swung around to point the gun at Will, Will was off the bike and the bike was heading straight toward the driver.

Will didn't slide across the asphalt—there was a limit to his stupidity. What he did was try to hop off. The shift in weight lifted the motorcycle's front wheel up into the air. Instead of flipping back on itself, it roared across the tarmac on its back tire.

Oddly, Will recalled a show he'd seen on Animal Planet the week before. Bear attacks. Tense stuff. During one of the reenactments, a giant black bear had reared up, mouth open, claws up, as the victim just stood there waiting to get mauled.

And so it was with the driver. He stood there motionless with his gun out in front of him. The screaming Indian seemed to leap at him. Metal met metal, then skin, then bone. Blood sprayed. Hair was wrenched from the scalp.

It really was a lot like the bear attack.

Will fared only slightly better. His body didn't just stop because he was no longer on the bike. The momentum wasn't entirely unexpected. As he jumped off, Will tried to pitch to the side. Tuck and roll, just like they'd taught him. Of course, drills couldn't prepare you for the massive shock of hitting the interstate with nothing but your own body fat to cushion your fall. Will hit the pavement like a clapper striking a bell. His entire skeleton jangled inside his skin.

Will was no stranger to getting the shit knocked out of him. He'd blacked out before. Somewhere in his mind, he knew how to fight it, but it was too late for thinking. He saw more stars, then darkness, then nothing at all.

2.

Will was sitting in the back of an ambulance when a black Suburban with smoked glass pulled into the parking lot of the Lil' Dixie Gas-n-Go.

"You all right?" the paramedic asked. "You just groaned."

"Yeah," Will said. He had groaned. And with good reason. "Just having a bad day."

"No shit, dude." The paramedic looked back at the Suburban. An older woman with a helmet of salt-and-pepper hair jumped down from the driver's seat. She called something to the passenger, a blonde wearing the Georgia Bureau of Investigation's regulation dark blue shirt and tan khakis.

The paramedic noted, "Somebody called in the big guns."

"Yeah," Will repeated. He angled himself out of the ambulance, wincing from the pain in his shoulder. "Thanks for patching me up."

"You might wanna get that looked at."

"It's all right." Will winced as he tried to shrug his shoulder, which felt like it had slammed into the pavement going thirty miles an hour. He asked, "That cop gonna be all right?"

"Still in surgery." The man tilted his head to the side like he had to consider the prognosis. "He's young. In good shape. That goes a long way." He glanced back at the Suburban. The driver had her hands on her hips. She wore sunglasses, but even a blind man could see the flames of fury burning in her eyes. "I bet they got some questions for you." He looked at Will. "You ask me, you're some kind of hero taking out that guy with your bike. Probably saved that lady's life."

"It was a good bike," Will said. "Closed loop, sequential, port injection with heated oxygen sensor."

"Damn." The man slowly shook his head, and they both shared a moment of silence for the fallen Dark Horse.

“Thanks again.” Reluctantly, Will headed toward the Suburban. There was an escort for him, a Clayton County cop who was shaped like a shepherd’s crook. In keeping with the theme, he herded Will toward the black SUV. Will pulled the cotton out of his nose as he walked. It hurt like a bitch, but this was not the kind of crowd you wanted to show weakness to.

Law enforcement officers were everywhere—Clayton County cops, Forest Park cops, Clayton County sheriff’s deputies, some officers from the Georgia Highway Patrol, and a smattering of GBI agents, who were trickling in from the Panthersville Road headquarters. The entrance to the parking lot was blocked by several cruisers. Crime scene tape crisscrossed the broken plate glass. A white sheet covered the dead body inside the store. Yellow cards marked spent shells, fibers, trace evidence.

And yet, no one was doing much of anything. They all knew that jurisdiction wasn’t something that had to be hashed out. Pro forma, the GBI was always asked to investigate officer-involved shootings. Even Will’s escort peeled off when they reached the Suburban’s gravitational field. The SUV was a G-ride, short for “government ride.” The vehicles the GBI used were easy to spot if you knew what you were looking for. The rear was lower to the ground than the front because of the heavy metal gun cabinets bolted in back.

The GBI was to the state of Georgia what the FBI was to the country. Despite what Hollywood portrayed, neither agency could just waltz in and take over an investigation. Except in instances of child abduction or drug trafficking, the GBI had to be invited onto a case before they could work it.

Clayton County, by virtue of its squalor, offered another exception. After the county’s coroner was caught running a drug ring out of the back of his funeral parlor, it was decided by all involved that it would just be easier to pay the state to perform all of the county’s medical examiner duties. This included but was not limited to cases of murder. And in this particular case, a man had definitely been murdered. Sure, he’d been in the process of robbing a convenience store, but murder was murder.

Then there was the guy Will had plastered with his bike. Like the cop who’d been shot, the driver of the Chevy had been rushed to the hospital. Unlike the cop, he probably wouldn’t make it.

Will didn't know if that counted as an officer-involved death or vehicular homicide. The only thing he was certain of was that his boss was about to stick her foot as far up his ass as it would go.

"What the hell are you doing here?" Deputy Director Amanda Wagner snapped off her sunglasses. Will had been right about flames of fury in her eyes, though up close, they certainly burned a lot hotter. "You were supposed to be in Macon this morning. You should be checking in with your parole officer right now."

Will looked to his partner for help. Faith Mitchell's gaze settled on the giant sign in the window that advertised cold frozen drinks inside. She looked back at Will, offering an almost imperceptible shake of her head.

Amanda said, "Arrest him."

Faith looked as surprised as Will felt.

"Bill Black is a material witness to a crime who is also on parole and who also has a history of armed robbery." Amanda's voice turned into a low hiss. "Seventy-five thousand dollars, Will. That's how much it cost to put you undercover. And that doesn't include the thirty grand we're going to owe Fulton County for the motorcycle. You are officially costing me more than you're worth."

"I'm sorry," Will said, trying hard not to make it sound like a question.

"You'd better just be damn glad no one was close enough to get your face in those videos." She nodded to Faith. "Cuff him."

Faith mumbled something that was just loud enough for Will to hear. Still, she took out her handcuffs. "Turn around."

"My shoulder kind of hurts."

Faith gave a heavy sigh. "Hands out front."

Will held out his hands, mindful that cops from at least five agencies were watching his arrest. Amanda probably had a point about his cover. He still had an undercover case to work in Macon, which was about an hour from where they stood. Cops talked to each other all the time. They would share the story of the con who ran his bike into a guy standing in the middle of the interstate.

Will wondered if it looked as cool as he remembered.

Amanda said, "Read him his rights before you bring him into the store." She slid her sunglasses back on. Her high heels made a snapping sound as she walked across the parking lot. Probably from her cloven hooves rubbing together.

Faith ratchetted down the handcuffs. "You stopped for an Icee, didn't you?"

Will exercised his right to remain silent.

"Did you lose consciousness?"

"No," he lied.

"Are you going to tell Sara about this?"

"Of course," he lied again. In order to tell Sara what had happened, he would have to tell her why he was on his way to Macon.

"So," Will said. "There's video?"

"Amanda's right. From what we've seen, nobody got a good shot of your face."

He tried, "How about that motorcycle trick? Cool, right?"

"It reminds me of Evel Knievel." She made sure the handcuffs were tight. "You know, when he tried to jump over the Snake River Canyon on his bike."

He gently corrected, "The X-2 Skycycle was a steam-powered rocket, not a motorbike."

"Whatever, Will. How'd it go for him?"

Will didn't answer her. There was a reason Knievel still held the world record for the most broken bones in a lifetime. "You look nice today."

Faith jerked him toward the store. Will wasn't certain whether it was kindness or forgetfulness that made her drag him by his uninjured arm.

They found Amanda standing in front of an old tube television set behind the counter. She was surrounded by beefy, tall cops, but her presence was such that the men seemed reduced around her. Amanda had spent her life in law enforcement. Her father had been a cop. She'd come up when the only thing the Atlanta Police Department could agree on was that women didn't belong in uniform. To say there was a chip on her shoulder was to say that Chuck Norris was kind of a badass.

She didn't look up when Faith dragged Will inside, but obviously she knew he was there. "Mr. Black, would that be you hiding behind the Yodels?"

Will leaned in, squinting at the paused image. The camera was mounted over the front counter, but instead of capturing the front doors, the lens was pointed toward the back of the convenience store. There Will was—curled into a ball, hands over his head.

He said, “I believe those are Little Debbies.”

The laughter died down as quickly as it started. A pointed look from Amanda cleared the front of the building. She waited until just Will and Faith were left in the store with her.

“Run it down for me,” she told Will, though history told him that she likely had more information than he did.

Still, he gave her the highlights, substituting the Icee quest for a gas run. “I guess he got scared when he heard the sirens,” Will said, meaning the driver of the Chevy. “He ran out of the store, jumped into his truck. I pursued. You know what happened next.”

“Everyone does. It’s all over Hooter.”

Will hoped she meant Twitter.

Amanda supplied, “The driver of the truck has been identified as Wayne Michael Walker. He’s at the hospital now. It doesn’t look good. The cop got off a shot before your little chase. Nicked the femoral artery. Of course, that pales in comparison to taking a full-body slam from a ten-thousand-pound motorcycle.”

Will said, “It’s probably closer to seven hundred.”

She pressed together her lips before continuing, “Walker’s fifty-three years old. He’s a high school counselor, recently fired from the Clayton County school system.”

Faith gave a low whistle. It took a lot to get fired from Clayton County. “What’d he do, slap a kid?”

“Yes.”

Faith seemed a little shocked.

“At any rate,” Amanda continued, doling out the information she’d obviously gleaned on the drive down, “Walker’s accomplice worked at the same school—Spivey Senior High. Math teacher.”

“He didn’t look like a teacher,” Will said. “He looked like a homeless man.”

Amanda picked her way across the debris littering the floor. Will stepped in to help her when she knelt in front of the dead body, then he remembered he was in handcuffs and that people in handcuffs didn’t tend to help the police.

She pulled back the sheet. “Douglas Raymond Pierce. Doug-Ray to his friends. Coached girls’ softball. School-wide teacher of the year last year.”

Will accepted that he really was some kind of idiot. The John Deere baseball cap was tilted back on Doug-Ray Pierce’s head, giving Will a clear view of where dreadlocks had been sewn into the rim. Likewise, the bushy porn mustache was a fake. The spotty goatee was all Doug-Ray. Take off the disguise, and he looked like every math teacher/coach Will had ever had.

“What about their next of kin?” Faith asked. She was scrolling through the closed-circuit footage. Will looked at the set. He saw himself dive behind the Little Debbies. And then the film reversed and he ran backward. And then the film played out and he went down again.

Amanda supplied, “The driver, Wayne Walker, was born and raised in Forest Park. He got his degree from Clayton State College. He’s twice divorced, currently single. Both exes live outside the state—one in Idaho, the other in Massachusetts. He has a twenty-year-old daughter who’s stationed in Afghanistan. We’re trying to track them all down, but it’s rough going.” She paused, and Will could tell she was exasperated for other reasons now. “Walker has no history of violence except for slapping that student. He’s as financially stable as you’d think a high school counselor would be, usually pays his bills late, but he always pays them. He hasn’t been issued a speeding ticket in the last seven years. He has a master’s in social work, for what that’s worth. And I should add that universally, one word came up in all the interviews we’ve conducted so far: ‘asshole.’ ”

“And Pierce?” Faith asked, not looking up from the TV. Will saw himself diving again.

“On paper, Doug-Ray Pierce is more of the same. We found nothing on his record but a speeding ticket in Florida three years ago,” Amanda told them. “Personal details are still being filled out. He’s new to the area—been here less than two years. Before that, he taught in west Georgia. We’ve got people heading over to Spivey High to conduct interviews. Preliminarily, no one seems to know much about Pierce. His emergency contact is his father, who died three months ago. Pierce was a loner by all accounts, never talked about his private life. Except for Wayne Walker, he didn’t seem to have any friends.”

“Gay?” Faith asked.

“Not if you take off the mustache,” Amanda quipped. “What exactly are you doing?”

Faith paused the footage again. She pointed to the screen. “Look here.”

Amanda normally kept her reading glasses on a chain around her neck. Will guessed she'd left them in the car. She leaned forward, her nose almost touching the screen. "What am I looking at?"

"Here." Faith pointed to the fish-eye mirror. "This is the only camera in the store, but you can see some of the front entrance in the fish-eye mirror. Watch the truck."

Will leaned in, too. The footage was the kind you normally found in convenience stores. The equipment was old. The VCR tapes were reused. The average cell phone camera had a hundred times better resolution. Still, he could clearly make out a man crawling out of the back of the truck. He kept low, knees bent, back curved, as he shuffled away. Instead of going into the store, he headed toward the back.

Three robbers, not two. One in the truck. One in the store. One securing the exit.

Faith asked, "No known associates on either man?"

Amanda had her phone out. She dialed a number as she told Faith, "We've got data processing running their backgrounds. It could be an hour or more before the computers spit anything out." She held up her finger for silence as she put the phone to her ear. It was answered on the first ring. She said, "Nick, we've got a third suspect, possibly on foot. He was hiding in the back of the truck. Close down the perimeter for five miles. Pull all recently reported stolen vehicles. I want door knocks on every house within a two-mile radius. Send me a tracking team and start a fingertip search of the woods behind the store."

She nodded as Nick obviously relayed some new information to her.

Will looked down at his cuffed wrists. His back had been to the window when the guy jumped out of the truck, but he still felt bad for missing what was obviously an important clue. And that wasn't all he'd missed.

Will asked, "Where's the bag of money?"

Faith said, "Is that what you had?"

"What are you two talking about?" Amanda had finished her call. "What money?"

Faith fast-forwarded the tape, and Will saw his mad scramble down the aisle, the plastic bag full of cash gripped tightly in his hand. Faith paused the image. The bag was on the floor. They all turned in unison and looked at the same spot on the floor.

The money was gone.

“Well.” Amanda paused dramatically before continuing, “If only we had a way to know what happened to that bag.”

Faith took the hint. She fast-forwarded the tape. Will saw himself stand up again. This time, instead of walking backward, he was running forward to tackle Wayne Walker.

“There you go,” Faith said. The girl from the front counter had apparently not run out the back door to find help. She’d stuck around, waited for the right moment, then sneaked back in and grabbed the bag of cash.

Faith paused the tape. “This doesn’t make sense. The person who got out of the back of the truck looked like a man.”

“That’s because he was. Is.” Will explained, “That’s the girl behind the counter. She took the money on her way out.”

“No.” Faith shook her head. “We’ve got her outside. She’s a hundred years old if she’s a day.”

Will shook his head, too. “She’s twenty, tops.”

“How hard did you hit your head?” Faith indicated an old woman sitting in the back of a police cruiser. The door was open. Her long gray hair was disheveled. Her blue dress was faded from too many washings. Even from twenty feet away, it was obvious to Will that the woman’s face more closely resembled a dried apple core.

Amanda supplied, “She’s the mother-in-law of the store owner. He’s currently out of town on business. She can’t recall where he is, and the Lil’ Dixie Gas-n-Go corporate phone number rings at the store.” Amanda indicated the old woman with a wave of her hand. “Samantha Lewis, or Maw-Maw, as she likes to be called, said she was working here all morning. She’s sketchy on the details, but I’ve had worse eye witnesses.”

Faith pointed out, “She couldn’t bend down to pick up that bag of money, let alone run like that.”

Will wondered if Faith was right about his head. Then again, Will could clearly recall the girl behind the cash register, the way she’d eyed him appreciatively after the cop had tried to rattle his cage.

He walked around the counter and started searching the shelves, which was made infinitely more difficult because of his cuffed wrists.

“What are you doing?” Amanda asked. “That area hasn’t been cleared yet.”

Admittedly, Will didn’t know much about women, but he knew that they didn’t go anywhere without their purses. That is, unless there was an opportunity to exchange their purse for a bag of cash.

He pulled out a pink handbag with green and blue spots all over it. Certainly not the kind of thing an elderly woman would choose. Will tried the zipper, but his hands were too close together to do anything useful.

Faith already had on a pair of gloves. She grabbed the bag and dumped the contents onto the counter. Will felt an inordinate amount of relief when he saw the pink lip gloss he recalled the girl applying to her lips. Faith was more interested in the wallet. She read from the license, “Billie Eugenia Lam, born October 9, 1994.”

The name sounded old-fashioned, but the photo showed the young girl Will remembered.

He said, “That’s her. She was behind the counter the whole time.”

Faith asked, “What the hell? Maw-Maw said in her statement that she was ducked behind the counter the entire time.”

“What the hell, indeed.” Amanda crossed her arms over her chest. “According to the interrogating officer, Maw-Maw says she works here three days a week. When she’s not volunteering at the church, that is.”

“What a sweet old lady.” Faith flipped through the photographs in the young girl’s wallet. Will looked over her shoulder. He saw the usual stuff—Billie and friends posing with pouty lips and too much makeup, snapshots from a fun day at Six Flags, a photo of the dance floor at some club they weren’t old enough to get into.

There were no family photos, but the last picture showed Billie from a few years earlier. She must’ve been in high school. She also must’ve been into sports. She was wearing a red and white uniform. Her ball cap was low. She had a softball bat resting on her shoulder.

Faith asked, “What do you wanna bet Doug-Ray Pierce was her coach? Only this uniform isn’t from Spivey High.” She explained, “Jeremy used to play Spivey during regionals.” Her son had been a basketball player. “Their uniforms are green and white. The mascot is a mustang. This looks like a ladybug on her chest.”

Amanda reminded them, “Doug-Ray Pierce taught in west Georgia before he moved to Forest Park two years ago.”

“Maybe he was diddling his players, Billie being one of them. She followed Mr. Pierce from west Georgia. She gets a job here, they do this heist.”

Amanda finished, “And Maw-Maw lies to keep her granddaughter from going to prison.”

Will didn’t completely buy the theory. “That would make sense if Pierce did it on his own. There’s Walker and the third guy from the back of the truck. Plus, Pierce is a pretty crappy bad guy. He wasn’t easy with the shotgun.”

“Winchester Model 24.” Faith looked at the weapon on the floor. Someone had secured it with a zip tie, looping the plastic through the breach. “Pistol grip, beavertail forend, full choke.”

Amanda cut to the point. “That’s not the kind of weapon you rob a convenience store with.” She started typing into her phone. “I’ll put a fire under ballistics and see if we can trace ownership.”

Faith bent down by the weapon. “Serial number’s been sanded off.”

Amanda gripped her phone.

Will ran it through his head again, Doug-Ray Pierce’s shaking voice as he told Billie to give him the money, the man’s strange rebel yell before he pulled the second trigger.

Will said, “Pierce didn’t seem to know that he only had two shots.”

“So, our math teacher isn’t an evil genius.”

“My money’s on the school counselor.” Faith had watched the tape through and was ready to render her opinion. “He shot Pierce in the head, bull’s-eye, straight on. He nearly killed you, too, by the way.” She gave Will a look that he really didn’t need to see. “Wayne Walker is thoughtful, methodical, a planner. He knew when to cut rope. He could’ve grabbed the cash, but he ran when he heard the sirens.”

“Scared of getting caught?” Will suggested.

“Too smart to get caught,” Faith countered. “Remember what Amanda just said: everybody anybody’s talked to so far says Walker’s an asshole. He’s probably the kind of guy who tries to control things. Look at the tape when he gets back into the truck. He doesn’t have to think about it. He jumps in, heads straight for the road, takes his turn onto the interstate. If this stupid store kept their surveillance tapes, we'd probably see him doing dry runs for the past two weeks."

Will looked at Amanda. She could be a horrible person, but she'd never gone after them for tossing around theories.

"Spit it out," she told him, rolling her hand to urge him on.

He said, "Walker got fired for slapping a student. That doesn't sound like somebody who has everything under control."

"Have you been in a high school since you graduated?" Faith asked. "I'd probably slap those kids until my hands fell off."

She wasn't exactly the poster child for patience, but Will said, "Walker hesitated when he hit the main road. The turn onto the interstate was at the last minute."

"On purpose?" Faith asked, and Will couldn't really answer the question. Walker's last-minute turn had sent the cruiser straight into the bridge railing. Except for Will, he probably would've gotten away.

"All right." Amanda ended the speculation. She was staring at Samantha Lewis sitting in the back of the cruiser. Maw-Maw knew how to work the old-lady thing. Someone had brought her a blanket and a bottle of water. "What now?"

Faith indicated Billie Lam's license. "We go to Billie's address. This license was issued less than a year ago. She probably still lives there."

"You think she's stupid enough to go home with the money?"

"I think criminals being stupid is what keeps us in business."

"Fair enough," Amanda allowed. "Report back. And run down every detail you can find on this Billie Eugenia Lam. I want to know what she had for lunch yesterday afternoon."

"Yes, ma'am."

Out of habit, Will started to follow Faith.

"Not so fast, Mr. Black." Amanda smiled like she meant it. "I've got other plans for you."

3.

Will sat in the manager's office of the Gas-n-Go, counting backward in his head by sevens. He'd started at a thousand and was in the low two hundreds when he heard Amanda's voice from somewhere inside the store.

Or at least he thought it was Amanda's voice. He'd never heard her sound so kind in his life.

"I know, dear," she said. "I'm sorry we have to keep you. We're just going to leave you back here for a few minutes while I find someone to drive you home."

There was a low hum—a woman's voice, frail and incoherent. By process of elimination, Will guessed Amanda was speaking to Samantha Lewis, a.k.a. Maw-Maw.

Sure enough, a moment later, the old woman appeared in the office doorway. Amanda's hand was cupped underneath her elbow, her arm wrapped around the woman's waist as she helped her shuffle into the room.

Amanda said, "Oh," when she saw Will, as if she'd forgotten he was there.

Will stood up, muscle memory compelling him to go to his feet when a woman entered.

Amanda's tone was more what he was used to when she directed, "Stay out in the hall, Mr. Black. Keep your mouth shut and your eyes where they belong. And be mindful that there are at least a hundred police officers surrounding this building."

Will muttered some soft obscenities as he walked into the hallway. He watched Amanda help Maw-Maw settle into the chair. She needed the assistance. Up close, Will would've put her age somewhere in the mid-eighties. Her balance was off. She didn't sit in the chair so much as fall back and trust there was something to catch her.

Amanda asked, "Ms. Lewis, are you sure I can't get you anything? Is there someone I can call?"

"Oh, no, dear. I wish I could remember where my son-in-law is, but so much has happened today that it's set my brain all abuzz."

Amanda pressed, "We haven't been able to locate a phone number for him other than at the store."

"I'm sure it'll come to me. I don't set much by these new-fangled telephones you can carry around in your pocket." Maw-Maw patted Amanda's hand. "I'll let you know the minute I remember."

"I'll be right outside the store if you need me."

Amanda gave Will a nasty look as she left the office. He was fairly certain he would've gotten the same response even without the old woman. He watched her walk up the hall. Instead of heading toward the exit, she stopped about fifteen feet away. Amanda leaned her shoulder against the wall. She crossed her arms and waited.

Will looked back at the old woman in the office. She was probably under a hundred pounds, even with her heavy orthopedic shoes on. Her dress was too big for her frame. He imagined it was the smallest size she could find. She was built like a bird, from her narrow shoulders to her tiny wrists, which reminded him of Pixy Stix because of the various rubber bracelets she wore. Livestrong. Breast cancer research. Support our troops. Will had seen a display of the bands by the cash register. He wondered if she'd paid for them, and then he felt guilty for thinking that the old woman would steal.

Of course, she had already lied to the police, so there was that.

"Well." Maw-Maw glanced up at him, curious, but too polite to stare.

Will turned his attention to the scenery out the back door. Amanda wasn't lying about the cops. He counted at least ten men walking around the field behind the building, and that was just the cops who were in his line of sight.

The old woman asked, "Is the lesbian gone?" There was a waver to her voice, like a weak signal from a radio station. She tried to make it stronger, yelling, "I asked, is the—"

"Yes."

"Good." Maw-Maw was smiling at him like she hadn't just said what she'd said. "She thinks she's hiding it with that skirt, but you can always tell. We can't forget that Satan was the most beautiful angel before the Fall."

Will didn't know what to say, so he concentrated on not looking up the hallway, where Amanda was probably pulling her gun out of her purse.

Maw-Maw whispered, "Why'd you cover for me?"

Will cleared his throat. He took his time answering. "Cover for what?"

She seemed exasperated. "About this morning. You know I wasn't here."

Will shrugged. He assumed Bill Black would lie to the cops as a matter of pride.

"Is it money you're after?" Tears came into her eyes. She clutched the neck of her dress in her frail hand. "I'm an old woman on a fixed income. There's nothing I can offer."

Will couldn't look at her, mostly because he felt like the worst sort of bad person, the kind who preyed on old people.

Down the hall, he heard a thumping sound: Amanda's high heel hitting the floor, sort of like the way a horse thief digs its heels into the flesh of an innocent pony.

Will swallowed, then made himself look back up. "Why'd you lie?"

"Please, mister ..." Her voice took on a pleading quality. She was still afraid he would tell. "I know it's wrong, but I had my reasons."

"She your granddaughter?" Will guessed from her reaction that he was on the right track. There weren't a lot of reasons to volunteer yourself up to the police. "They're gonna find her. They know her name. Billie Lam."

Maw-Maw looked terrified by the news. "How do they know?"

"I heard the cops talking to the lesbian." He let a smile come, figuring it might make him look devious. "They found Billie's purse under the counter. They know she was here."

She slumped back into the chair, nearly disappearing in the dress. Her head started shaking. He wasn't sure if this was on purpose or from some kind of palsy. "This is down to my worthless son-in-law."

"He robbed his own store?"

"Of course not. Why would he rob himself?" She kept shaking her head. "After Billie's mama died, all he cared about was taking them expensive fishing trips and taking money outta the store.” She shrugged. “Of course, he’s a kike. What did I expect?”

Will wasn’t up on his racial slurs. “Kike,” he echoed. “Is that for Polacks?”

“Jews,” she corrected. “Where’re you from?”

“Atlanta.”

“Huh,” she said, like that explained it. “What else did you hear the po-lice say?”

Will took a gamble. “You first.”

“Pierce,” she told him. “That’s the colored man got shot.”

“I heard he got caught having sex with a student.”

Maw-Maw raised an eyebrow, but she didn’t reveal whether or not that student had been her granddaughter. “You know what we used to call his type back in my day? Farm equipment.”

Will found himself blinking too rapidly. Maw-Maw just sat there innocently with her hands curled in her lap, legs crossed at her tiny ankles. She had to be the most adorable racist Will had ever met in his life.

He said, “If you really wanna help your granddaughter, you’ll tell the police where she is. They just wanna know what happened. She won’t be in any trouble.”

She started shaking her head again. “Ain’t no situation ever got better with the po-lice involved.”

“She wasn’t part of the robbery. She just saw a good opportunity and took it.”

She kept shaking her head. This time, he could tell it was on purpose.

Will said, “You can get into a lot of trouble for lying to the police. It pisses them off, and you don’t want them pissed off when they find her.”

Maw-Maw seemed to think it over. For just a moment, Will thought she was going to give up her granddaughter.

And then something changed.

She sat up in her chair. She looked down at the handcuffs around his wrists. “Why are you asking me all these questions? You sound more like the po-lice than a criminal.”

Will caught movement out of the corner of his eye. Faith had taken Amanda’s place down the hallway. She was leaning forward, practically hanging on every word.

Will tried, “I’m just trying to help you out.”

"I don't need your help," she snapped, though he was pretty sure she couldn't get out of the chair without assistance, let alone ensure her granddaughter's safety. "I can do fine by myself."

"Lookit, I don't care one way or the other." Will tried to put some authority in his voice. As sexist as it sounded, women of Maw-Maw's generation generally responded well to men in authority. "I'm just offering some friendly advice. The police can protect her. You can't do this on your own."

Some of her resolve seemed to slip. "I don't know."

"Anything you can tell them would be helpful."

"I guess I could tell them some. Since they know she's my granddaughter anyway." She seemed to think of an idea. "I can tell 'em about Billie helping with the nursery at the church. She's good like that, good with children."

"You need to tell them where she is."

Maw-Maw opened her mouth. Will could practically see the words moving to the tip of her tongue. And then she clammed up. "I just don't know, sonny. Hand to the Bible, I would tell them where she is, but I just don't know."

4.

Will leaned into a curve as Faith sped toward the hospital. He felt like he was on his bike again, but they were in Amanda's SUV, which wasn't built for zigzagging across the road.

"She was so smug," Faith said, meaning Maw-Maw. "It's like she thinks we can't touch her."

Will stared at her. "What did you hear in the hallway? That wasn't my read at all."

"Please. She played you like a fiddle. All that old-woman bullshit, meanwhile she's lying to the police. She's obstructing a case. A cop was shot. Another man was killed. You were nearly shot in the process. You could've died. Wayne Walker caused millions of dollars in damage trying to get away. That old biddy knows something, and she should pay for holding it back."

"Well, when you put it that way."

"How else would I put it?"

Will didn't have an answer for her.

"You never knew your grandmother. Trust me, they're not all they're cracked up to be."

Will tried to move her along. "What did you find out about Billie Lam?"

Faith had to breathe through it before she could answer. "Not much more than what Maw-Maw told us, which—believe me—has me more worried than not." She beeped her horn at a car that wasn't moving fast enough. "Billie Lam is a college dropout. Her mother died when she was twelve. No siblings. No cousins. Maw-Maw said the father isn't around much. He uses the income from the store to go on fishing trips down in the Gulf. They don't see him for weeks at a time."

Will might have fallen for the old woman, but Faith had a point about not taking all of this information at face value. "Did you lift any prints from Lam's purse?"

"She's not in the system."

"You ran a records check?"

"Through the DMV, through the county systems, through every single database we have access to." She listed it out. "We don't know her social security number. We don't have her credit score. We don't have a cell phone number for her. We don't know who her friends are. We don't know jack."

"Have you talked to the father?"

"More don'ts. No phone number. No address. His credit record is a mess, but everything is registered to the store or a PO box. Maybe he lives with his mother-in-law, but who knows? The agent who drove Maw-Maw home went into her house. You know this. There was no one inside. He checked the place top to bottom."

She was right. Will did know all of this. He knew that the same agent was sitting outside Maw-Maw's house, that both Doug-Ray Pierce's house and Wayne Walker's apartment had been turned upside down. They'd been working this case for nearly three hours and still nothing viable had turned up.

Faith said, "While you were enjoying your chat with Maw-Maw, I rattled some cages at the school board. Didn't you think it was weird that Doug-Ray Pierce got fired for messing with a student, but he walked onto a job in another county?"

"I just assumed Clayton was desperate for teachers."

"Me, too," Faith said, "but apparently even they have standards. Somebody pulled in some big favors to get Doug-Ray Pierce hired in Clayton County."

"Wayne Walker," Will guessed, because it was the only thing that made sense. "He's older. He had what passes for tenure around here. He'd know people at the county office."

"Exactly." Faith took another sharp turn. Will grabbed the dashboard.

She told him, "A secretary at the county office gave me the story. Walker vouched for Pierce, said that he was fired off rumors, that nothing was proven—which is technically true—that they went after him because he's a black man and he was accused by a white student. Birth of a Nation, yada yada."

Will was missing a connection. "How did Billie Lam know Wayne Walker?"

“Walker went to their church. So says the secretary.” Faith shook her head. “This is still a small town. Everybody’s up in everybody else’s business.”

“Not that it’s been much help.” Will rubbed his face, trying to concentrate. “Maw-Maw said the son-in-law is Jewish.”

Faith glanced his way. “They go to an Episcopal church. His name is Gilbert Caldwell. I just assumed he was Billie’s stepfather.” She wrinkled her forehead. “Why would Maw-Maw lie about him being Jewish?”

Will shook his head, too. It seemed Maw-Maw lied just for the sake of lying. “What about friends? Billie had pictures in her wallet. She must’ve known people from church or school.”

“We’re talking to people from both, but Billie’s a ghost. She’s nineteen years old. We don’t know what school she went to because Maw-Maw can’t remember. Billie doesn’t have a record. She doesn’t own a car. She’s never filed a tax return. We don’t know her social security number, so we can’t pull her bank accounts. I’m sure she has a cell phone but who the hell knows what the number is.” Faith slowed the Suburban, turning in to the hospital parking lot. “I tried to look her up on Twitter and Facebook, but the only Lam in the area is a sixty-year-old parole officer who lives in Atlanta. I sent her a message. She’s never heard of her.”

Will racked his brain for other ways to find the girl. “The family doesn’t have other properties? She’s hiding out somewhere.”

“No properties. We’re knocking on every door at every fleabag motel around.”

“That’s a lot of motels,” Will said. Forest Park was near the airport. You couldn’t throw a rock without hitting a motel. “Billie got to work somehow. She has to have a car.”

“Maw-Maw’s powder blue Honda was parked behind the store. We turned it inside out.” Faith bumped the gear into park. “Nothing. That’s the story of this case: nothing.”

Will pushed open the car door. “Either she’s a criminal mastermind or she’s very lucky.”

“Or both.”

He followed Faith to the loading dock, asking, “Any reason Amanda wants me here?”

“I don’t question orders.”

She was a better liar than Maw-Maw. "I'm still maintaining my cover, right?"

"I guess so. She told me to bring you through the back. McClendon's out of surgery, but there are still cops all over the place." She stepped on a chock and boosted herself onto the loading dock. "Pete McClendon, that's the name of the cop who was shot."

"He clean?"

"Who the hell knows? The doctors are keeping him in a coma because of the pain. We won't get to talk to him for another day at least."

The large metal door was rolled only partway up. Faith walked underneath, but Will had to bend down to make the clearance. He pulled his phone out of his pocket to check the time. The glass was scratched. He felt lucky Amanda hadn't logged it into evidence just to prove a point. It was only a few minutes after noon. Will guessed all the dockworkers were at lunch.

Faith took a moment to get her bearings, consulting the emergency exit map to find the freight elevator. Will helped her lift the heavy door, which opened like a guillotine. Carts of soiled laundry lined the back wall of the car. They both stared ahead as the elevator creaked into action, taking them to the top floor.

Will said, "All this because of the blinking light on an Icee machine."

Her jaw set. "Sure. That's why."

"Five minutes later, I would've been out of there."

She wouldn't look at him.

He said, "There was a Triumph at the impound lot. I guess I can use that when I go down to Macon."

"Make sure it has a cup holder."

The elevator groaned to a stop. She finally looked at him.

"Oh." Will was slow on the uptake. He would've been trapped at the store even longer while he drank the Icee. "Have I ever told you that you're a really good detective?"

"Whatever." Faith lifted the elevator door. She didn't look back to make sure Will followed. They had about twenty feet of hallway before a turn. He tried to think of a witty rejoinder, but then he turned the corner and saw Amanda.

She was waiting for them by the nurses' station. As usual, she was reading something on her phone. She didn't look up as she asked, "Anything?"

Will figured it was his turn to take one for the team. "No, ma'am. We're trying to verify Maw-Maw's story, but we're hitting a lot of dead ends."

She still didn't look up. "Talk to that patrolman over there."

Faith walked over to the cop. He was so young Will doubted he had to shave more than twice a week. "You have something for us"—Faith read his name off his uniform—"Mixon?"

"Yes, ma'am." The cop took off his hat. "Pete was in that store every day at the same time. I was his boot for three months. We went there every single day."

Will knew a boot was what they called a patrolman in training. He asked, "Why did he go in there?"

Mixon didn't seem to want to answer Will's question, probably because Will looked like a thug.

Faith said, "Why did he go there?"

Mixon was still reluctant, but he finally said, "He was sweet on the girl worked behind the counter."

"Seems like a lot of men were," Faith noted. "Why wasn't McClendon wearing his vest when he went into the store?"

Mixon shrugged. "He always had it on when I worked with him."

"His logs didn't report anything suspicious at the store. Did he say something to you? Indicate there might be a problem?"

"No, ma'am. I'd tell you straight out." He rolled his hat in his hands like pizza dough. "I was thinking, though, if they cased the place, then they'd know Pete was there at the same time every day. Maybe this was a hit? Something professional set up by one of the gangs?"

"Did McClendon deal with any gangs?"

"Well, no, ma'am. His beat cuts through an industrial area. He was mostly called out to break-ins and such. There's been a ton of robberies around there, usually in the early hours, sometimes late at night. Smash and grab. Real organized. We got our detectives on it, but they ain't caught nobody yet."

Faith had spent the first decade of her career in a squad car. She knew what the pay was like. "Did McClendon have any other jobs? Something he did for extra cash?"

"I know he taught CPR classes over at Spivey. Some of the teachers wanted to get certified 'cause of all these school shootings.”

“Spivey,” Faith echoed. “Thank you, Officer. We’ll be in touch if we have any questions.”

He put his hat back on and headed toward the stairs.

Faith said, “Pete McClendon worked at Spivey Senior High.”

As usual, Amanda was a step ahead of them. “According to the principal, Wayne Walker recommended McClendon to teach the CPR course.”

Will tried to get a handle on where they were. They’d all worked robberies before. Usually it was through familial or community connections that they were able to break open a case. “We’ve got Pete McClendon tied to Wayne Walker through the school, Wayne Walker to Billie Lam through the church, Doug-Ray Pierce to Billie Lam possibly through softball camp, maybe even a teacher-student affair.”

Faith added, “What about the third man in the back of the truck? Where are we on finding him?”

“The same place we were three hours ago—clueless.” Amanda sounded exasperated. “Wayne Walker just woke up from surgery. They stopped the bleeding, set his pelvis and both arms, wrapped his ribs, which have been rendered into oatmeal, but he’s refused further treatment.”

“Can he do that?”

“This is America. We have a constitutional right to make unhealthy choices.” Amanda started down the hall. They followed. “His fever’s spiked. The gunshot wound was a ricochet, low velocity. It’s just a matter of time.”

Will knew this was bad news. A high-velocity bullet generated enough heat to cauterize and disinfect the wound. A low-velocity shot opened up the body to all kinds of infection.

Amanda said, “He wasn’t in the best of health to begin with. Brittle diabetic, pack-a-day smoker, high blood pressure, overweight, and then there’s the melanoma he’s been fighting for the last four years.” She stopped outside a closed door where a GBI agent stood guard. “He knows he’s going to die without treatment. Let’s pray he wants to unburden his soul.”

Faith started to go in, but Amanda stopped her.

“Mr. Walker has made it clear he’s not going to waste the last few hours of his life explaining himself to a woman.”

At least Will finally understood why Amanda had let him come to the hospital. He pushed open the door. Sunlight flooded the room, probably some doctor's or nurse's attempt to bring in some UV rays and kill the infection.

And there was no mistaking that an infection was raging inside Wayne Walker's body. The blankets covering him were soaked through. He shivered like a parody of someone who was freezing to death. His teeth chattered. What was left of his hair was stuck to his head like pieces of moldy straw. His eyes were wide with panic. Sweat dripped down his face, pooled under his chin. He looked exactly like what he was: a man who was in the process of dying.

Still, Will took his time. Under Walker's watchful gaze, he dragged over a chair, letting the legs scrape the floor. Will stopped a few feet from the bed. He tried to keep his expression passive. In Will's experience, deathbed confessions weren't all they were cracked up to be. On the one hand, there were the people who held out a tiny sliver of hope that a miracle would occur. On the other were the people like Wayne Walker, who seemed ready to not only embrace death but give it a big, wet kiss.

Will sat down in the chair.

"You." Walker's teeth clicked around the word. He blinked rapidly, like he was afraid to close his eyes too long. "You're a cop."

Will guessed Wayne Walker had seen a lot sitting in that truck outside the convenience store. "That was a good shot," he told Walker. "Taking out Pierce like that. Right through the center of the head." Will didn't have to work to sound impressed. Walker was some kind of marksman. "I don't know a lot of cops who could make that shot."

Walker didn't respond. He just lay there shaking like a paint mixer. The pain must've been excruciating. Will could make out the cast covering his entire lower half. Both arms had been broken. Pins and bolts stuck out of the casts, which were frozen in a permanent Hammertime. His neck and face had been belted by a motorcycle tire. The shattered ribs alone must've been torturous. Will had broken his share of ribs. Just breathing could cause a knifelike stab to your lungs. Every movement put you in deeper agony.

Will said, "You know you're going to die if you don't let the doctors give you treatment.”

Walker’s shoulder jerked up, which Will guessed was voluntary. “Rather die than go to jail.”

Will had heard these words before, but he’d rarely met someone who was ready to go through with it. “You got Doug-Ray Pierce the job at Spivey.”

Walker’s mouth worked, but it took a few seconds for him to make words. “Worthless cocksucker.”

Will could see why people called this man an asshole. “He must’ve been your friend at some point.”

“Fuck him. He was—” Walker was racked by a violent shudder. He called out from the pain. “Oh, God!”

Will knew he should feel some kind of compassion. The man was a killer, but he was a human being in pain. Still, there was something so pervasively off-putting about the guy that all Will could do was sit back in the chair and wait for the episode to pass.

Walker clenched his jaw to stop his teeth from chattering. Will thought he was going to keep up the silence, but he hissed out, “It was Billie.”

So, the teenager was at the heart of this after all.

“Pete was supposed to get shot in the arm.”

“With a shotgun? By a man who didn’t know how to use a shotgun?” No wonder Pete McClendon had stunk up the bathroom. Will’s stomach would’ve been upset, too. “Tell me what’s really going on here, Wayne. I know there’s more.”

“She was two-timing me.”

“Billie?”

Walker watched him carefully. There was real fear in his eyes. Will was beginning to think death wasn’t the man’s biggest concern right now. He was either covering for the third man or he was covering for somebody else.

Will asked, “Where is she?”

Walker turned away. Guttural sounds came from his throat. Will wasn’t sure, but it sounded like he was crying.

“Tell me where she is, Wayne. That’s the only way she stays safe.”

Walker didn’t answer. Will guessed Billie had managed to tie him into knots. There was no other reason for him to protect her.

“You were a teacher,” Will tried. “I know there’s good left in you.”

Walker’s mouth opened in a sob. “Tell Terri ...” He stopped to swallow. “Terri ...”

“Your daughter?” Will remembered. Walker had a twenty-year-old serving in Afghanistan.

“Tell her ...” Walker began. “Tell her my last thoughts were about her.” He had to stop to breathe through the pain. “Promise me you’ll tell her that.”

“I promise,” Will said. “But you can tell her yourself, Wayne. Let the doctors treat you. You’re not a bad guy. You just did a bad thing. You can make that right now.”

“She’s a soldier,” Walker said. “I’ve always been proud of her.”

“You can tell her that yourself.”

Walker took a deep breath. His teeth started chattering again. Will thought he was having a seizure until the man mumbled, “Don’t hurt her.”

Will thought he meant Terri, but then he realized Walker was still worried about Billie. “I have no intention of hurting her.” Will didn’t think prison would hurt Billie that much. “Let’s end this, Wayne. Tell me where she is. Maybe I’ll let you see her before you go.”

“Please.” Tears streamed down Walker’s face. “I did everything you told me to.” His throat worked as he tried to swallow. “I’m begging you. Don’t hurt her.”

“I won’t,” Will repeated, wondering where this was coming from. Maybe the fever had reached Walker’s brain. “I promise you, Wayne. I’ll do everything I can to keep Billie safe.”

“No!” His lips smacked together. They were darker now, almost black. “They got her at the house. You gotta save her.”

“What house?” Will leaned over the man. He wanted to shake him, but he was already shaking too much on his own. “Who has her, Wayne? Who has Billie?”

“Not Billie,” he whispered. “Gloria.”

5.

Will sat in the mobile command center watching the GBI's SWAT set up outside Gloria Pringle's house. They couldn't use Clayton County SWAT. According to Wayne Walker, Officer Pete McClendon was part of a ring of dirty cops who'd been robbing local businesses for the past year. There was no telling who else on the force was involved.

The speakers inside the converted box van buzzed with a low static. A man's voice said, "Team three, check." Another answered, "Team one, check."

Will thought about the story he'd finally gotten off Wayne Walker.

Four hostages were inside the two-story house: Gloria Pringle, her nineteen-year-old daughter, her twenty-year-old son, and the son's nineteen-year-old girlfriend.

They were being held by two masked men, all heavily armed, all ex-military. Wayne Walker had been very specific about the weapons inside the house. AKs. Fully automatic. Enough ammo to last through a long siege. Flash grenades. Explosives. Pipe bombs.

And Billie had orchestrated it all.

Will studied the bank of monitors inside the van. They showed real-time footage from the head cams the SWAT team wore. Two women checked inside Gloria Pringle's station wagon. Their weapons were out in front of them. He heard a woman's voice from the speakers. "Team six, check."

"Something's not adding up here," Will said, though Faith and Amanda were only half listening. Their eyes were glued to the monitors. Six men were stationed under each window in the front of the house. Another team was preparing to breach the front door while several other teams secured the back.

Will said, "There was maybe a thousand dollars in that cash register.” He started pacing back and forth in the tight quarters. The van shifted with his weight. “There’s three men outside that store: Walker, Pierce, and the third guy, the one who went around the back. There’s Billie inside. There’s Pete McClendon, who’s running some kind of French Connection. They’ve kidnapped Wayne Walker’s girlfriend, her family, her son’s girlfriend, so that’s two more guys.”

Faith was finally paying attention. “All for a thousand dollars.”

“I don’t care what kind of magical spell Billie casts on men, that’s just south of a hundred fifty bucks each for a whole lot of risk.” Will stopped pacing. He braced his hands above him on the ceiling. “Let’s say I believe there’s a ring of cops breaking into businesses.”

“It’s happened before,” Amanda said.

“More than once before,” Faith corrected. “We are talking about Clayton County.”

“All right.” Will relented. “We’ve got a ton of break-ins on Pete McClendon’s beat. It’s one of the most crime-ridden areas of the county, which—yes—that’s saying a lot.” Will paused for a breath. “Let’s say McClendon was involved in all of those robberies. We’re talking around ten thousand dollars each job—tools, light machinery, a couple of safes. McClendon hits them at night or early in the morning, when he knows nobody is going to be there. I buy him being in on that. But what happened at the Lil’ Dixie doesn’t fit his pattern.”

Faith said, “Broad daylight, witnesses, right out in the open during rush-hour traffic.”

“Right,” Will said, glad she finally understood. “This doesn’t sound like a stickup. This sounds like a hit where maybe they get to keep a little cash.”

“Pete McClendon was the target,” Amanda said. “That’s an interesting theory.”

“Maybe not just Pete McClendon. Doug-Ray Pierce was shot, too.”

“You think Wayne Walker wanted them both dead so he could have Billie to himself?”

Faith said, “And his girlfriend. Don’t forget Wayne said he’s been dating Gloria for a year.”

“About that,” Will started.

Amanda’s cell phone rang. She held up her finger for silence.

Will watched her face as she listened to the call. And then he couldn't see her face anymore because she put her head in her hand.

Finally, she said, "Very well. We'll discuss this later."

Amanda made a show of putting her phone on the desk in front of her, setting it parallel to the edge. "That was Nick Shelton. Maw-Maw gave his men the slip."

Faith narrowed her eyes. "An eighty-four-year-old woman sneaked out of her house under the noses of two trained GBI agents?"

Amanda quipped, "Thank you for the summation, Faith. It wasn't clear to me until now."

The speaker crackled again. The SWAT team commander said, "Deputy Director, all teams in position. Good to go?"

Amanda tapped the button on the microphone. "Hold. Repeat—hold." She looked at Will. "You've got twenty seconds. Finish your thought."

Will ran through all the information they'd found while the SWAT team was staking a perimeter around Pringle's house. "We couldn't find one person at the school or the church who said Wayne Walker was dating Gloria Pringle. The pastor said he was under the impression that Gloria couldn't even stand him, that there was some bad blood between them. That Wayne had bad blood with just about everybody." Will repeated the pastor's words. "Wayne Walker is an asshole. Even his ex-wives won't return our calls because they don't care whether he lives or dies."

Faith got back to brass tacks. "We've got no phone calls between Wayne Walker and Gloria Pringle going back six months. No overlapping credit cards. They never even bought gas at the same station or shopped at the same Walmart. They don't work together. Gloria's kids didn't go to his school."

"So why would Walker send us here?" Amanda indicated the monitors. "He had to know we'd bring an army. He's practically put al-Qaeda inside that house. I've got a helicopter set up two miles from here. Tell me what Walker is playing at."

"I don't know," Will said. "I wish I could tell you. This just feels wrong."

"Your feelings have always mattered so much to me." Still, Amanda tapped the mic again. "Major, do you have eyes inside the house?"

“That’s a negative, ma’am. Shades are all pulled. We hear a television. There’s some interference from a microwave.” He paused a moment as he switched to another channel, then back. “We think the daughter’s upstairs. The son and mother appear to be downstairs. No idea where the girlfriend is. Maybe in the basement.”

“What’s on TV?”

If the major thought this was a strange question, he didn’t say. “Sounds like The View.”

Amanda sat back in her chair. She steepled her fingers together. It didn’t take her long to form a new plan. She told Will, “Go knock on the door.”

“What?” Will and Faith said in unison.

Amanda spoke into the mic. “Major, I’m sending my agent to the front door. Tell your team to drop back.” She looked up at Will. “Don’t worry. They’ll still be there for cover.”

Will felt a bead of sweat roll down his back. He was pretty sure he was right about this, but he wasn’t sure enough to risk his life.

“Oh, for God’s sake.” Amanda pushed herself up from the chair. She threw open the back door and was down the steps by the time Will managed to jump down from the van. She walked across the yard with her head high, ignoring the twenty men surrounding the house. Two steps up to the porch. Another two steps to the front door.

Amanda raised her hand and knocked.

Will waited. He heard laughter inside the house, obviously from the television. A woman’s voice called a jovial, “No, no! Let me get it!”

The bolt slid back. Then the thumb latch turned. The door opened. An attractive woman in her fifties with long dark hair stood in her bathrobe. She smiled at Amanda. Then she saw Will and Faith and her smile faltered.

Then she saw the SWAT team surrounding her house and started screaming.

6.

“Wayne Walker is a lying asshole.” Gloria Pringle stabbed her cigarette out in the ashtray, only to grab up her pack for another. “Hell no, I never dated him. He should be so lucky.” Her hands shook as she lit a new cigarette. “What were you going to do, bust in here and kill us all?”

Amanda used her diplomatic voice. “We were told the men who were holding you hostage were trained mercenaries.”

Gloria laughed out loud. “And you believed that?”

Will let Amanda handle the question. He glanced around the woman’s kitchen, which was decorated in a strawberry theme. Strawberry wallpaper. Strawberry curtains. Strawberry tablecloth. Even the canisters on the countertop were shaped like strawberries.

“I don’t even know why he bothers to go to church,” Gloria said. “Not like he’ll get into heaven.”

Faith came into the kitchen with three surly-looking young adults in tow. “There’s no one else in the house. They all tell the same story. They’ve been here all morning. They have no idea why Wayne Walker would say they were being held hostage.”

“We could sue you,” the girl said.

“For?” Amanda asked.

The girl didn’t have an answer.

Amanda turned to Gloria. “Why would Wayne target you like this?”

No one spoke, but there was a definite air of guilt among the strawberries.

Finally, the litigious girl spoke up. “Terri used to date Connor.”

Will guessed Connor was the young man slumping against the refrigerator. He had the floppy blond hair and boyish good looks of a player.

"I broke up with her," Connor said. "She wanted to get serious, but I was, like, not with you being gone for a whole year. Oh, hell no."

Will provided, "Walker said he wanted Terri to know he was thinking about her."

"Thinking about her?" Gloria trilled. "Sending a SWAT team to my house because my son broke up with his daughter?" She waved her cigarette in the air. "Fucking crazy, that's what this is! Just crazy!"

"Whatever." Connor started to leave.

Amanda asked, "Where did you say you were this morning, young man?"

"Here." He indicated the house. "Me and Sheila was sleeping one off."

"He's telling the truth," Gloria said, as if she would offer up her son otherwise. "I checked on them when I got in from work."

"When was this?"

"Around eight-thirty this morning. I work the night shift at O'Kelley's." She sucked on her cigarette. "They're a parts supplier off Kennedy Road."

Will asked, "That's near Exit 40?" The Lil' Dixie was off 40.

"Yeah, I just missed all that traffic this morning from the holdup." Her hand stopped a few inches from her face. The cigarette smoldered. "That was Wayne, wasn't it? That whole thing this morning."

Amanda asked, "Why do you say that?"

"Because that's just the kind of asshole stunt he'd pull."

"You seem to know a lot about him."

"I got a pair of ears and we go to the same church. He's probably just as much up in my business as I'm up in his." She took a hit off the cigarette. "Plus, I dated Wayne's half brother back in high school. Caused a bit of a stir." She told her children, "Believe it or not, there was a time when a white woman could get killed for sleeping with a black man."

"And I'm outta here," Connor said. He slinked back out of the kitchen with the two girls following close behind.

Will saw the vein in Amanda's forehead had started to throb. It seemed like she was having trouble speaking. "Wayne Walker has an African American half brother?"

Gloria nodded vigorously. "He lived with his daddy over on the other side of town, but everybody knew.” She played with her lighter, flipping it end over end. “Me and Doug-Ray dated in high school, then he moved to west Georgia to go to college, then he moved back here a couple’a-three years ago. His daddy died recently. I read about it in the paper. I guess I could’ve taken off to go to the funeral, but we’re on time and a half, you know?”

Will couldn’t keep the reluctance out of his voice. “What about Pete McClendon? Do you know him?”

“Pete.” Gloria huffed out some smoke. “There’s a blast from the past. I don’t know how that fool managed to get in uniform. He stole my purse one time when I was over at his aunt’s house. We found it under his bed, bless his heart.”

No one asked the obvious question, but Gloria was on a roll now.

She explained, “Pete is Wayne’s cousin on his mama’s side. Now, as I recall, Miss Mina passed away when Pete was a baby, so Wayne’s Maw-Maw raised him.”

Will got a sinking feeling in the pit of his stomach. “Maw-Maw?”

“That’s Mrs. Lewis. I’m sure she has a first name, but I can’t remember it.” She jabbed her cigarette toward Amanda. “You run across her, you wanna be careful. That woman’s nothin’ but a spoon. She’s always stirring up shit.”

Amanda pressed her fingers to her temples. “Samantha Lewis is Wayne Walker’s mother?”

“And Doug-Ray’s.” Gloria laughed out some more smoke. “Which was hilarious, because if you’ve ever talked to her for even a second, you know she’s racist as hell.”

“Yes,” Will said. “We’ve talked to her.”

“It’s not just blacks.” Gloria wasn’t finished. “She found out one’a the teachers at Wayne’s school was a lesbian and had her run out on a rail. And it takes a lot to get fired from the Clayton County school system.”

Faith shook her head, like she needed to clear it. “Where does Billie Lam fit into all of this?”

“That piece of trash?” Gloria stubbed her cigarette out by the others. “Like I said, I haven’t talked to any of them in years, but I hear she followed Doug-Ray up here when Wayne got him a job at the school.”

Amanda made it clear. “Billie followed Doug-Ray back to Forest Park, not the other way around?"

"What she wanted to do up here is beyond me. Same trailer, different park." Gloria lit another cigarette. "Why are y'all looking at me funny?"

"Billie isn't Maw-Maw's granddaughter?"

She sputtered out smoke as she laughed. "Oh, hell no. Maw-Maw woulda drowned a girl before she raised her. You think she hates men? You should see what she does to women. I'm not sure why she talked Gilbert into hiring Billie to work at the store, but mark my words, Maw-Maw was working an angle. Don't let her fool you. She's a crafty old bitch."

Will noted an absence of saliva in his mouth.

Faith said, "Gilbert Caldwell is Maw-Maw's son, not her son-in-law?"

"By a different daddy from Wayne and Doug-Ray. Never married none of them, of course." She pursed her lips. "My mama used to say Samantha Lewis had a rocking chair for an ass."

Faith asked, "Did she have any more children?"

"Just the three boys, God bless their souls. And Pete, though like I said, he was her sister's kid."

Amanda pushed herself up from the table. She rarely showed her years, but today was an exception. "Thank you for your time, Ms. Pringle. We'll follow up if we have any more questions. In the meantime, if you hear where Billie might be, we would appreciate a phone call."

"No problem. You'll be the first to know." Gloria walked them toward the door. There was a look of concentration on her face. In Will's experience, the best details always came out when an interview was over. Gloria Pringle was no exception.

"What about the house?" she asked, holding open the front door. "Did y'all check Doug-Ray's house?"

"Yes," Faith answered. "Doug-Ray's house, Wayne's apartment, Maw-Maw's house."

She didn't mention that Maw-Maw had given them the slip, but Will could tell from the way Amanda's jaw set as she walked onto the porch that the thought was prominent in her mind.

"What about Arthur's?" Gloria smiled when they all stopped and turned around. "Arthur Pierce. He was a mailman. Died about three months ago." Her smile started to falter. "Y'all know Doug-Ray's daddy left him a house?"

7.

Arthur Pierce had left his son a two-bedroom clapboard house located in a section of Forest Park that bordered Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport. The house wasn't exactly on the runway, but Will felt the need to hunch his shoulders as a Delta jet came in for a landing.

He walked up the driveway. There was a silver Pontiac Firebird parked in front of the closed garage. Will glanced in as he passed, making sure no one was hiding in the back. He headed toward the front porch. Weeds had grown through the cracked concrete, but Will could tell the house had been well maintained until three months ago when Arthur Pierce passed away. And he had really died, because they'd all seen his death certificate, tax returns, property deeds, and records on his closed pension account.

The day's events so far had served as an unwelcome reminder of why they taught you at the academy to verify all witness testimony down to the last detail.

Arthur Pierce was without question deceased. They'd talked to the funeral home that buried him and his friends at the VA who'd been there when he clutched his chest and keeled over onto the poker table. By all accounts, the senior Mr. Pierce was a stand-up guy. He'd been a mailman, which explained why his mailbox was painted dark blue with an American flag on each side. The front door was a matching blue. There was another American flag hanging from a column that held up the small shed roof over the door. The material was tattered from the elements, which Will was glad Mr. Pierce did not have to see.

Will had planned to knock, but the front door was cracked open. He used the toe of his boot to push it the rest of the way. He had Faith's Glock tucked into the back of his pants, but he didn't pull the weapon. Maybe this wasn't exactly wise. Every minute of Will's day had been spent underestimating people.

The house smelled musty and closed up. Doug-Ray hadn't bothered to clear out his father's furniture or mementos, but he'd availed himself of all the copper in the house. Plaster had been hammered away in chunks. The ceiling looked like the world's largest rat had bounced its way across the beams. Pipes, electrical wire—anything that could be sold for scrap had been removed long ago.

Which didn't explain the coppery smell in the air.

Will felt the hairs on the back of his neck go up. He put his hand on the Glock, but didn't pull it. There was only one thing he could think of that smelled like copper but wasn't copper, and that was congealed blood. Something about the iron hitting oxygen brought about the scent. Every cop had a different description for it, but what it boiled down to was the smell of metal that hooked into the back of your throat like a fishing lure.

He walked through the front room as quietly as he could. Broken plaster littered the floor. The carpet was wet and moldy. There was a hole in the roof somewhere. Doug-Ray had probably talked to a real estate agent and realized very quickly that no one would be interested in buying his father's house. According to the tax records, Arthur Pierce's home was one of only three in the neighborhood that wasn't in the process of foreclosure.

Will peered into the two bedrooms and a tiny hall bath before making his way to the kitchen. Something told him this was where he would find Billie, and he was right. Only, he hadn't anticipated the state in which she would be found.

She was lying on her back in the kitchen doorway. Her bleached blonde hair flowered around her head. Her arms were out, hands open. Her eyes were deep blue. They were also glassy, most likely because of the large kitchen knife sticking out of her chest.

Will stood over the body. He didn't bother to bend down and check her pulse. He didn't want to give Maw-Maw the opportunity to jump him.

The old woman was sitting at the table smoking a joint. She blew on the tip, one eye on Will as he stepped over Billie's body and entered the kitchen.

"She came at me," Maw-Maw said, her voice raspy from the smoke. "I thought she was gonna kill me."

Will looked at the scene. There was some evidence to support a struggle. Kitchen utensils were scattered on the floor. Drawers were open where someone had furiously searched them.

Only, it wasn't just one or two drawers that were open, but every single drawer in the room. In Will's lengthy experience with stabbings that occurred in the kitchen, he was hard-pressed to think of a case where someone searching for a knife started with the bottom drawers and worked their way up.

Maw-Maw waved at the chair across from her. "Sit down, sonny. Let's talk."

Will reached into his pocket. He took out his iPhone. "I'm going to record this."

"Suit yourself."

"As a police officer, I have to inform you that you're entitled to a lawyer. You have a right—"

"To remain silent, et cetera, et cetera," she interrupted. "I'm eighty-four years old. You think I haven't seen my fair share of Murder, She Wrote?"

Will didn't recall Jessica Fletcher ever making an arrest, but for the sake of the recording, he asked, "You're waiving your rights, Ms. Lewis?"

"Yes." She impatiently pointed at the chair. "Now sit."

Will sat. He put the phone on the table between them. The little needle on the readout bounced back and forth as a jet roared overhead.

Will waited for the noise to fade, then asked, "Do you want to tell me what happened?"

Maw-Maw held a lungful of smoke before letting it out. "Poor Billie. She knocked on my kitchen door a while ago. I knew those cops were outside. I tried to get them, but she grabbed me." She showed Will a mark on her wrist where he had no doubt Billie Lam grabbed the old woman, probably to keep the knife from going deeper into her chest. "She took me out the back and brought me here."

"That's her car in the driveway?"

"Gilbert's," Maw-Maw provided. "He let her drive it to work. That's just the sort she was. Give her an inch and she takes a mile."

"Was Gilbert the third man at the gas station today?"

She gave him a disappointed look. "You're getting ahead of yourself.”

Will held out his open hand, indicating she should continue spinning her defense.

“I tried to help that sweet girl. Got her a job at the store. Took her into my home. And then she drags me here. Holds that very knife to my neck and tells me she wants all my money.” She inhaled deeply. “I don’t know how it happened. I managed to get the knife somehow. I wasn’t going to hurt her. I just held it out in front of me, and she ran toward me, and ...” Her voice trailed off. She gave Will a cat’s smile. “Poor little thing. She was so young.”

“You said she was your granddaughter.”

“Well.” The smile still played at her lips. “She was just as good as. That girl felt like family. All I ever wanted to do was protect her.”

“Like you were trying to protect your sons?” Will leaned forward. “Wayne Walker and Doug-Ray Pierce.”

“Both dead,” she told Will. “I heard it on the news. Wayne died half an hour ago. Bless both their hearts.”

Will hadn’t heard about Walker, but he wasn’t surprised. “You don’t seem too broken up that two of your children are dead.”

“Wayne was sick for a long time with the cancer.” She blinked, and he wondered whether her moist eyes were for show. “He was an asshole, but he was my asshole.”

“And Pete McClendon?”

“Sweet, but stupid.” She chuckled as she took another hit from the joint. “So stupid.”

“He was robbing businesses on his own beat. We talked to the detectives on the case. They were about to arrest him.”

“I told him he’d get caught eventually—don’t shit where you eat—but that boy was a shit-eater from the day he was born.”

“What about the store today?”

She set the joint down on the edge of the table. Will watched it smolder against the linoleum. Her hand shook as she reached out to the phone. She was better at working the device than Will. A series of swipes turned off the recorder, then she pressed the button and powered it down.

She put the phone back on the table and picked up the joint.

She said, “It was Wayne’s idea. He knew he was dying, wanted to go out with a bang. Fly to Vegas, get some hookers.” She lowered her voice. “Let’s be honest, nobody was gonna sleep with that asshole unless they was gettin' paid for it."

Will had to take a moment to digest her words. It was very convenient that Wayne couldn't dispute the charge. "What about Doug-Ray?"

"He was following Wayne's lead. That's just how they are, isn't it? Always looking for the fast score, too lazy to make it happen on their own. I told him it would get him killed one day." She puffed out a cloud of smoke. "Men never listen to reason."

"Did you know Wayne was going to kill Doug-Ray?"

"They were brothers, but they never got along." She added, "And Arthur's pension from the post office died with him, so what's the point?"

Will had always thought being able to live your life was a good point. "There was only a thousand bucks in that cash register."

"A thousand twelve," she corrected. "Never lie about money, son."

Will shook his head. He still didn't understand, and he wasn't too proud to admit it. "All of this for a little over a thousand dollars?"

"Anybody ever tell you you're just about as ignorant as a goat?"

Will didn't respond. Amanda often compared him to farm animals. "What's in it for you, Maw-Maw? I don't get it."

"Well, let me walk you through it, boy." She counted off on her fingers. "Wayne got fired, but he's still got his pension and life insurance policy through the school. Doug-Ray has about the same, but Pete's the jackpot. A hundred thousand dollars for being killed in the line of duty. And happened just in time, I guess, if those detectives were as close as you say to locking him up." She seemed pleased with herself. "I'm next of kin with his mama and daddy gone."

"Pete's not dead."

"Yet." She shrugged. "If he makes it, he'll get disability. The investigation will go away—let's be real, the county doesn't need another scandal on top of the pile. I guess I'll have to take care of little Petey again." The wink she gave Will suggested what kind of caregiver she planned on being. "Poor boy."

"What about Billie?"

Maw-Maw's face twisted in disgust. "She pulled a baby-daddy scam on Doug-Ray. I saw it coming a mile away, but he was blind to anything had more than one hole between the legs. That girl was about as pregnant as I was. I let her live with me so I could keep an eye on her. She spun some story about losing the baby. Of course, I couldn't kick her out after that. I'm a Christian."

"You needed her as a witness," Will realized. "The store really had to be robbed. She had to back up Pete's line-of-duty death."

"Which she would've done if everything hadn't gone to hell."

Will floated his theory. "Doug-Ray and Pete weren't meant to survive the robbery. Shooting Pete in the chest wasn't an accident. Neither was shooting Doug-Ray in the head."

"Wayne had one foot in the grave. The melanoma was gonna take him in a few months. I told you, he never much liked Doug-Ray, and Pete always got more poon than he did, which can grate on a man. I'm sure you get where I'm coming from. Every single one'a y'all walk whichever way your compass needle points you."

Will had to say, "For the mother of three sons, you really seem to hate men."

"What can I tell ya? I've known too many of them to think otherwise. Present company excluded, of course."

Will doubted he was an exception. Hate radiated off her like the heat lamp over the nachos at the Lil' Dixie.

He thought of something that hadn't stuck out before. "The surveillance camera was angled to the back of the store. Billie's testimony about the robbery would've been the only thing the police had to go on."

"Which would've worked great if the little bitch hadn't run out the back screaming her head off. Took everything I had in me to keep her from going to the police." She soured her face. "You don't think I wanted to be up there this morning pretending like I saw the whole thing."

Will was fairly certain Maw-Maw had seen a great deal. He asked, "What kept her from turning all of you in?"

"Money," she said. "I threw the bag of cash on the roof of the store. Near about shocked me to death that y'all didn't look up there."

Will could only imagine the words Amanda would have for the agents who missed this. "Billie was supposed to get the proceeds from the holdup."

"Now you've got it."

"And Gilbert?"

“He’s the only one’a them ever added up to anything.” Her words were kind, but her expression said otherwise. “Not that that’s much, considering.”

“Where is he?”

“Dead eight days. Slipped and fell at the store. Cracked his head open like a walnut.” She shook her head. “I swear to God, if I’d known the police was this stupid, I woulda planned this whole thing a lot different.”

The woman had a point. Gilbert’s accident had happened in Clayton County. His death would’ve been investigated by the GBI medical examiner’s office. The autopsy report was probably making its way through the system.

“Poor Gil,” Maw-Maw said. “Little shit couldn’t run a business to save his life. Or my life, which is the part that matters. The whole damn place was falling down. Mortgaged out the wah-hoo. And then I find out he put my house up as collateral. I was gonna lose everything.” She pointed her finger in Will’s direction. “I’ll tell you what I told Billie: ain’t nothing you can get from a man that you can’t get better from a dog and a jar of peanut butter.”

Will felt light-headed.

She threw back her head and laughed. “Shut your mouth before you catch some flies, boy. I may be old as dirt, but I still got some life left in me.”

Will tasted blood in his mouth. His teeth had cut open the inside of his cheek.

“That it?” She pressed her hand to the table, making to stand.

“Sit down.” Will stopped thinking about what she’d said and concentrated on what she’d done. Her sons were dead—two of them by violent means; God only knew what had happened to the other. The boy she had raised was clinging to his life at the hospital. Billie Lam lay dead on the floor with a knife in her heart.

And Maw-Maw was certain she was going to get away with it.

Will reached for the phone. She clamped her hand over his. She was fast when she wanted to be. He could feel the sandpapery rub of her skin as he pulled his hand away.

He said, “The robbery was your idea, not Wayne’s.”

One shoulder went up in a shrug. The motion was almost lost under her loose-fitting dress. Will wondered what else she had under there. Faith’s earlier warning still echoed in his brain. He’d been played like a fiddle by this woman from the moment they'd met. Will took out his gun and put it on the table in front of him. His hand stayed on the grip.

"Well." She glanced down at the Glock. "That changes the tone."

"You're the reason they're dead. Wayne, Doug-Ray, maybe Pete. Certainly Billie."

She stubbed the end of the joint out on the table. "I only got a few years left. I'm not gonna end up spending them in some damn state-run nursing home stewing in my own piss."

"You sacrificed all those lives so you could enjoy your retirement?"

"I've earned it." She shrugged again, this time with both shoulders. "Two, maybe three less men walking the planet. As far as I'm concerned, I've done the world a favor."

"Not all men are bad."

She snorted, as if he'd told her a really bad joke. "You'd put me in jail if you could."

"Prison," he told her. "Jail is where you await trial. Prison is where you go after you're sentenced."

"You gonna put my picture in Busted?" She laughed at his surprise. "I work at a convenience store, numbnuts. We look at that thing every week to see how many customers are in it."

"I'm going to make sure you're the centerfold."

"You'd have to be a hell of a lot smarter than you come across."

Will leaned in closer. Maw-Maw did the same, like they were about to throw it down and arm-wrestle.

He said, "You've been lying to the police all day."

"I did what I had to do."

"You lied to the police about working at the store this morning."

"Yep."

"You lied to the police about being Billie's grandmother."

"Uh-huh."

"You lied to the police about your sons being involved in the robbery."

"I did."

"You lied to the police about being in the back of the Chevy this morning."

She smiled.

"I know that was you." Will recalled the shambling departure the third robber had made from the back of the truck. It wasn't the case of a man being covert. It was the case of an old woman trying not to break a bone.

He said, "You went to the back of the store to wait for Billie. You were there to make sure she didn't run."

She shrugged. "Girl never had much of a spine."

"You've been obstructing this investigation from the beginning."

"Yes, I suppose you're right." She employed her patented one-shoulder shrug. "Am I supposed to be sorry?"

"You killed Billie."

She moved back in the chair. She was cocky, but she knew she was talking to a police officer. "That was clearly self-defense."

Will narrowed his eyes. "Is it clear?"

"I'll get a good lawyer," she told him. "I've recently come into some family money."

"You even lied about things that didn't matter. Gilbert wasn't Jewish."

"He was never circumcised." She snorted with disgust. "I suppose Obamacare will take care of that."

Will refused to let her sidetrack him. "Why lie? Why lie to the police for no reason?"

"Because I can," she answered, like it was simple. "Because it's fun. Because watching y'all spin around chasing your tails all day has been the most entertainment I've had in ages." She gave a rascally chuckle. "If that's a crime, then arrest me."

"Okay." Will stood up. He pulled a set of handcuffs out of his back pocket. "Please stand."

"What are you doing?"

"Samantha Lewis, I'm placing you under arrest."

"What the hell for?" She was talking tough, but there was genuine concern in her eyes. "You can't prove I had anything to do with that robbery. You can't prove what happened with Billie was anything but self-defense."

"You're probably right," Will allowed. "But I'm absolutely certain I can prove you lied to the police. That's a felony, Mrs. Lewis. Each instance carries a five-year prison sentence. By my count, you just admitted to it four times, plus copped to willfully obstructing an investigation." He matched her hillbilly cadence.

“Did you not know all that’s illegal?”

“What the—” She tried to stand, nearly knocking over the chair in the process. “I didn’t—”

“You did.” Will reached into his shirt and pulled out the microphone that was clipped to the inside of his collar. “And you admitted to doing all of it on tape.” He hoped there was a twinkle in his eye when he smiled. “Thanks for waiving your rights, by the way.”

“I turned that off!” she screamed. The effort nearly knocked the wind out of her. She gripped the counter for support. “You bastard! I’ll cut off your balls and feed them to the pigs!”

Will opened the kitchen door. Faith was standing there. He had done a lot of outlandish things today—wasted twelve minutes waiting on an Icee, chased after a murderer without a gun or backup, jumped from a speeding motorcycle—but he didn’t have it in him to handcuff an eighty-four-year-old woman, no matter how detestable her crimes. Besides, her wrists were too thin for the cuffs.

Faith said, “Samantha Lewis, you have the right to remain silent.”

“Go to hell.”

“Please exercise your right to remain silent.” Faith tried to grab the old woman’s hands. “You have a right to an attorney.”

Maw-Maw slapped her away like she was swatting flies. Faith was not deterred. She held both of the woman’s wrists in one hand. With her free hand, she pulled out a plastic zip tie. Will saw Faith wince as the plastic cut against the woman’s thin skin.

“Idiots!” Maw-Maw said. “They won’t convict me! I’m just an old woman! I won’t spend a day behind bars!”

“Our boss is with the state prosecutor right now,” Faith told her. “You know we’re with the state, right? The jury for your trial won’t be from Forest Park.”

Maw-Maw’s mouth opened as she sucked air.

Faith continued, “Believe it or not, Georgia is cracking down on people who lie to the police. The attorney general plans on making an example of you.”

“That’s not true!” Maw-Maw’s voice had a pleading tone to it. “You watch. There’s not a jury alive who’ll convict me. I was protecting my family! Anybody would do that!”

“We’ll see in a year or so,” Faith said. “That’s about how long this will take to come to trial. Unless you have somebody who'll bail you out? Maybe a family member?"

Maw-Maw's mouth gaped open and closed. Will could almost see the wheels turning in her head. She mistook his attention for an opening, telling him, "What I said before—I told you, sonny, I got dementia. I can't remember things. I was under the influence of drugs. I got Alzheimer's."

"Keep practicing for the trial." Faith pressed her hand to Maw-Maw's shoulder to get her moving. "Maybe some of the girls at the jail can help you."

Will smiled as warmly as he could. "I hear they love meeting new people."

"No!" Maw-Maw lunged for Will. She grabbed his shirt in her fists. "You fucking bastard! You can't send me to jail! I can't live out my life with a bunch of dykes!"

Will carefully pried her bony fingers from his shirt. "Don't worry," he told the old woman. "I hear they taste just like peanut butter."